PREFACE

The first historical bibliographer of the Indo-Malay world, van der Chijs, always asserted that his work was but an attempt (proeve) to document the printed material which was its subject. Indeed he updated his classic bibliography twice as more materials came to light. Similarly, the most recent contributor to Indo-Malay bibliography, Salmon, modestly and wisely labels her work provisional. The present inventory does not pretend to match Salmon's exemplary work either in scholarship or in resourcefulness. But it does share a consciousness of how imperfect our knowledge of early Southeast Asian publishing remains. Salmon's work has awakened interest in a rather neglected area of literature. My hope is that the present inventory will do something similar. It may perhaps further resurrect the syair as an important mode of late-traditional literature, and make better known the books on Western science used in early Malay schools. Above all it may bring to notice the variety of scholarly and recreational works which appealed to Muslim readers in the nineteenth-century. Should new interest lead to the discovery of further material — as it is bound to — then this inventory will have served its purpose, and proved itself provisional.

In the task of assembling this inventory, my debt to Haji Ibrahim bin Ismail of the University of Malaya Library is profound. It was his enthusiastic professional concern for the University of Malaya's National Collection and his personal support which led me into this field — in which he had already accomplished much. I am also deeply thankful to David K.Y. Chng, formerly of the Singapore National Library, who unreservedly shared his extensive knowledge of early Singapore bibliography with me. On my second visit to London I gained greatly from the facilities generously afforded by Annabel Gallop, Curator of Indonesian and Malay, British Library, and no less from her advice and lively discussions. Librarians generally met my onerous and sometimes puzzling demands with courtesy, and sometimes with interested enthusiasm. I should mention particularly Helen Cordell of the School of Oriental and African Studies, who introduced me to her own collection and to others; also Raja Masitah Ariffin of Dewan Bahasa dan Pustaka, Michael Pollock of the Royal Asiatic Society, and Sanusi Mochtar of Perpustakaan Nasional Indonesia. My colleague in the Australian National University, Virginia Hooker, supplied valuable information on Riau.

This inventory now appears in print thanks to the University of Malaya Library and the Academy of Malay Studies, University of Malaya. For their support, co-operation and unfailing assistance I am deeply grateful to Mrs Khoo Siew Mun, Dr. Yaakub Harun, and as ever Ibrahim bin Ismail.

I should mention also Lee Yook, formerly of the Singapore National Library, who took a longer interest in my work and whom I must thank for delaying its completion considerably on two occasions.

INTRODUCTION

SCOPE OF THE INVENTORY

This inventory lists just under 1000 titles comprising over 2000 editions, and locates 2650 items on library shelves. It is restricted to publications in Malay, other Southeast Asian languages and Arabic, which were issued in the Straits Settlements, the Malay States of the Peninsula, and immediately associated areas (Sarawak, Riau, Palembang, and Bencoolen under British rule).

LANGUAGE

The inventory covers both works directed to a Malay audience and works in Malay and other Southeast Asian languages. Therefore religious works directed to a Malay audience in Arabic and Javanese are included, these being two of the scholarly languages of Malay religiosity. Conversely books using the Baba form of the Malay language and directed to a local Chinese audience are also included.

Bilingual works in Malay and English are included only if they might be used by a Malay readership. Thus dictionaries and vocabularies are included as a rule, while grammars and other studies are included only if intended for use by Malay speakers. Manuals for English students of Malay are not included.

Publications in other Southeast Asian languages — Bugis, Sundanese, Balinese, Batak, Tagalog, Thai, etc. — are included, although it cannot be supposed that they were addressed to a Malay audience.

PLACE

The geographical scope of the Singapore-Malaysia region is taken broadly. It includes the Straits Settlements, the Malay states of the Peninsula, Sarawak, Riau, Palembang, and Bencoolen. Inclusion of the last three areas deserves comment. Close ties existed between the literary and publishing world of Riau and the neighbouring urban centre of Singapore. As an instance of these links, the Al-Ahmadiah press of Penyengat-Inderasakti, Riau, was re-established in Singapore after 1911. Similarly, a few works issued at Palembang were printed in Singapore. The relationship with Bencoolen is different: early English missionary printing before 1826 in Sumatra and particularly at Fort Marlborough, Bencoolen, may be seen as a precursor of mission printing in the Straits Settlements.
EARLY MALAY PRINTED BOOKS

Works printed outside this region may have been intended for publication in Singapore or Malaysia, or at least for simultaneous release in the region. Some Protestant missionary tracts printed at Parapattan, Batavia, fall into this class, as do Catholic manuals printed in Hongkong. Similarly Malay-language Islamic works published in Cairo, Mecca, and Istambul may have been destined indirectly for the regional market. Even more specifically directed to Singapore outlets were Malay-language works published in Bombay. However, such items have not been included in the survey unless the place of publication (rather than printing) is explicitly or unambiguously located in the Malaysia-Singapore region.

Information on place of publication is not always available, however. Beside the books which survive in library collections, others are known through the advertisements inserted in their published books by Malay publishers advising of books available or in the press. While it can be established that most of these advertisements refer to Singapore editions known from other sources, for some few titles this is not evident. Such titles have nevertheless been included in the inventory, without library locations, in the knowledge that time will prove some to be Egyptian, Meccan, Bombay, or Batavian imprints.

TIME

The survey covers the period up to 1920. As the first Malay book printed in the region was probably published by the Mission Press at Malacca in 1817, the survey can be said to cover the first hundred years of Malaysian printing. The decision to close at 1920 was not, however, taken with this formality in mind. Rather it was through consciousness of a watershed in the development of Malay publishing which was crossed about 1917, the year in which the production of Malay newspapers exceeded that of commercially produced Malay books. From that time forward, a listing of books published becomes particularly inadequate to convey an impression of literate culture.

Undated material is included in the inventory only where there is reason to believe that it was produced before 1920.

NON-BOOK MATERIALS

Newspapers and magazines are noted but not described, being dealt with generally by reference to Roff’s Bibliography of Malay and Arabic Periodicals or Proudfoot’s “Pre-War Malay Periodicals” if that suffices. The names of persons and institutions associated with their production are included in the index of this inventory as well. A few early serials such as Cermin Mata and Bustan Arifin are more fully described because some of their material was also published in book form. On the other hand, Malay-language material in periodicals like Journal of the Straits Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society and the Journal of the Indian Archipelago has been ignored. In the few cases where separate issues and off-prints of scholarly journals were sold as monographs, a note suffices.
INTRODUCTION

In principle, non-serial non-book material finds a place in the inventory. Such items include posters, charts, invitation cards, and the like. In practice, the inventory is almost entirely concerned with books collected in libraries: non-book ephemera is less likely to have survived, and much of what has survived must lie yet undescribed in archives.

RESOURCES

The information upon which the inventory is based is both empirical and inferred. Empirically, the inventory is based on surveys undertaken in 1982/83, 1985, and 1990 with the aim of identifying early Malay printed material held in major library collections. The key institutions at which relevant material has been physically examined are:

- British Library, Humanities and Social Sciences, and Oriental and India Office Collections
- Cambridge University Central Library, including the library of the British and Foreign Bible Society
- Dewan Bahasa dan Pustaka (Language and Literary Agency of Malaysia)
- Koninklijk Instituut voor Taal-, Land- en Volkenkunde (Royal Anthropological Institute, Leiden)
- National Library of Singapore
- National Museum of Singapore
- National University of Singapore
- Oxford Institute of Social Anthropology
- Perpustakaan Nasional Indonesia (National Library of Indonesia)
- Perpustakaan Negara Malaysia (National Library of Malaysia)
- Perpustakaan Umum Pulau Pinang (Penang Public Library)
- Rijksuniversiteit te Leiden (Leiden University)
- School of African and Oriental Studies, including the Congregational Council for World Mission Archives
- Universiti Malaya (University of Malaya)

Information has also been deduced from certain secondary sources. These are principally library catalogues, both published and unpublished, and contemporary advertisements and notices. Given that an advertisement provides less reliable witness than does the physical evidence of a surviving book, care has been taken to distinguish empirical from inferred information. In conformity with this principle, books purporting to be held in library collections, but which have not been physically examined, are so noted.

The most important contemporary sources of inference are registrations of published books notified in Government Gazettes under various copyright laws. Such information is highly credible and detailed, though not always accurate, and far from comprehensive.11 Because of its importance it is reported fairly fully in this inventory. Other significant contemporary sources are the newspaper press, especially the Malay newspaper Jawi Peranakan, which carried extensive book advertising; the Straits Government Annual Reports on Education; and advertisements for school books inserted in the Straits Settlements Government Gazette. Other less tractable contemporary sources are publishers’ catalogues and the notices and stock-lists found in surviving printed books.12 In a few cases, otherwise unattested editions or titles have been included in the inventory on the strength of such information.

Later sources of inference are published catalogues and book-lists. These often show up losses from surviving library collections, but rarely allow identification of otherwise unattested material. The most significant such source is the published quarterly accession lists of the Batavian Society library,13 which is now incorporated in the Indonesian National Library.

I have characterised the major library holdings individually elsewhere.14 Taking a wider view of the collections, two outstanding features emerge. One is the dominance of the British Library collection; the other is the broad spread of extant editions across the libraries surveyed.

The dominance of the British Library collection stands on two pillars. In the 1830s and 1840s it rests on the Favre-Millies collection of mission imprints purchased in 188815. In the period after 1886 it rests on the deposit provisions of the copyright law applied in the Straits Settlements and later in the Federated Malay States. For the period after 1886, over 80% of the British Library holdings are copyright deposit items.
INTRODUCTION

The distribution of the books extant in library collections is noteworthy for the wide dispersal of unique editions, that is of editions not held in any other of the collections surveyed. A fair degree of overlapping might be expected in the larger collections, simply because of their size. But this is only the case with the National Library of Singapore, which has a low proportion of unique items. The other larger collections — the British Library, the School of Oriental and African Studies, Leiden University, and the Indonesian National Library — all boast more than one-third of their collections as unique editions. This is because of the way in which the collections were built up. The Singapore collection was heavily dependent upon the copyright deposit provisions, and therefore shares much material with the better-preserved British Library collection. On the other hand, the divergence of the other collections reflects the independence of their sources: scholarly bequests, Christian mission archives, and the commercial book market. Diversity of independent sources also explains the great richness of the two middle-ranking collections formed more recently in Malaysia, at the University of Malaya and at Dewan Bahasa dan Pustaka. Nearly half of each of these collections comprises unique editions, a proportion far exceeding that of any other collections surveyed.

How complete, then, is the surviving material? Do the major collections surveyed come close to fully representing publishing activity prior to 1920? The configuration of the holdings certainly gives no grounds for believing so. Although the copyright deposit procedures have been effective in preserving more than 80% of the material registered, the fact remains that only one-third of extant editions published in the Straits Settlements were registered. Furthermore, the significant proportion of unique material in every substantial collection surveyed (except that in Singapore) implies that we still have very far from a complete record of publishing activity. Particularly poorly represented are smaller ephemeral pamphlets, almanacs and booklets published both by Christian missions and by Muslims. Among the latter must be many printed devotional aids for Muslim brotherhoods (wirid, ratib), millenarian tracts (wasiat), and spells (jampi, azimat).

CONTOURS

An initial impression of the known extant material is that the first century of Malay publishing comprises a great diversity of material.

There are translations of Christian tracts and Biblical passages alongside Islamic religious guides. Works of high court culture, like the Sejarah Melayu, are there as well as humble folk tales like the mousedeer stories. Legendary romances abound, set in the Middle East, Central Asia, ancient China and, in the case of the Hikayat Hang Tuah, in the Malay lands. A wide spectrum of reference works is found — dictionaries and thesauruses, manuals for letter-writing and ready reckoners, astrological guides and dream interpretations, popular scientific tracts, and elementary schoolbooks — along with weighty Malay translations of learned Muslim commentaries and the most frivolous fictional verse. Even what might be thought a modern genre of literature, the short story, is present in a simple form. On the other hand some expected items seem poorly represented: there are but two printed editions of the Quran for instance.18

Beside a variety of subject, there is variety too in the manner of presentation. The presses of the early Christian missions put out rather clumsy printed typeset books, in marked contrast to the high quality typesetting achieved by the turn of century. Another contrast lies between the fine, neat, multi-coloured lithographs of the Singapore mission press and their commercial counterparts, which were often crudely produced lithographs on poor paper with blurred and untidy print.

Throughout the period Malay was printed in both the modified Arabic script (jawi) and in Roman script (rumi). The Roman script was used in several spelling systems. The early mission system was later revised to become the approved Government spelling, used for school books. Meantime the missionary Shellabear devised a new spelling for ‘low’ Malay, while the Catholic mission in Penang followed another system.19 Few books were published in the Dutch-based spelling current in the Netherlands Indies, and only one was clearly intended for circulation in the Singapore-Malaysia region.20

The alternatives of jawi and rumi and the different spelling systems overlay the varieties of Malay which found expression in print. Mission publishers made the distinction between ‘high’ Malay, used in works directed to the Malay community, and ‘low’ Malay, approximating to what is better known as ‘bazaar’ Malay, which was used to communicate in the Baba-influenced urban society. The translators of Chinese legendary romances were also conscious of the distinctiveness of their own dialect of Malay and contrasted it with the language of the Malay community. Within the usage of the Malay community further distinctions could be made between the registers appropriate for learned religious purposes and common use.21 Another further distinction in literary register lies between the various forms of prose on the one hand and verse on the other. Verse was characteristically in the syair form, which was popular with Malay speakers of all ethnic and linguistic backgrounds. Jawi books of syair verse constitute the popular literature of the late nineteenth century and the staple of the commercial printers. A related form of verse is found in the collections of pantun, which however seem to have been directed to a mainly Baba audience.22

CONCENTRATION OF PRINTING

This very varied material was overwhelmingly printed in Singapore. In the first half of the nineteenth century, Singapore’s preeminence is shared to a degree with the other Straits Settlements, as mission printing stations were located in each of these British territories. Thereafter Singapore comes into its own. From the 1840s onwards, Singapore became the principal urban centre in the Malaysian region, and provided a strong base for the rise of local commercial printing. For the latter period of this survey, fully 85% of the editions published appeared in Singapore (90% in the Straits Settlements). The prominence of Singapore stems from an array of linked factors. Among them are the urban mercantile environment of the Straits Settlements, with its higher levels of education and literacy. In the field of government publication of course, Singapore’s role as the supreme administrative centre of the British territories was decisive. For local commercial printing the key factor was Singapore’s place at the node of a commercial network based on Malay, Buginese, Chinese and other local shipping on the one hand, and the steamer links to India, the Middle East and Europe on the other. This made Singapore ideally sited for the dissemination of information into the peninsula and archipelago, and also a staging point for pilgrims from the archipelago sailing to and from Mecca. A further factor which made Singapore a desirable location for Muslim publishers in Southeast Asia was that it lay in loosely administered British territory, beyond the reach of the Dutch administration. The Netherlands Indies government applied draconian press laws, which obliged printers to deposit large bonds with the government and required pre-publication censorship. It also pursued a policy of active surveillance of Muslim activists. By contrast, under British rule, “a haji or a guru [could] circulate in the Malay lands as freely as an Englishman, coming to police notice only if he breaks the law.”

QUANTITY

It might be expected that the number of Malay printed editions would rise in line with increasing economic development and widening access to both European-style and Islamic education. However an examination of the numbers of extant editions over the period shows that this was not so. Rather, there appear to have been two peaks of output: the earlier, lesser peak in the 1830s and 1840s, and the later peak around the 1890s. Finally, from the 1900s onward Malay-language book publishing is in decline. The first low peak is supported by the early operations of the various Christian mission presses. For the first forty years, Malay printing was the preserve of the Christian missions, who alone had the technology of print at their disposal. In the period up to 1839, presses operated in Malacca, Penang, and Singapore, producing large numbers of tracts, scripture excerpts, an edition of the Bible in Malay, books for use in mission schools, and a handful of scholarly books. However this activity virtually ceased in the 1840s. Early optimism about the potential of the region as a mission field faded as energies were channelled into new opportunities in China in the wake of the Opium War. Large-scale mission printing revived in Singapore under Shellabear from 1890. He undertook much scripture printing for the British and Foreign Bible Society from the turn of the century.

But, as its fickle history reveals, Christian mission printing does not necessarily tell us very much about the demand for literary material or its consumption. From this perspective the second peak is more interesting, for the great contributor to this second peak was the Muslim commercial press. Muslim printing dates back to the 1850s and grew steadily through the 1860s and 1870s to a peak in the 1880s and 1890s, when we have evidence of a huge output of editions. While this outpouring from the Muslim presses coincides with the inception of copyright deposit in the Straits Settlements, the evident jump in output can be shown not to be merely an accident of the manner in which the extant material has been assembled.\(^{29}\) What we see in these last decades of the nineteenth century is an explosion of the manuscript tradition through the medium of print. The repertoire of the Muslim publishers of the period was by and large traditional. The variety of religious manuals, legendary romances and ballads committed to print were generally printed copies of manuscript texts. They were reproduced using lithography to achieve a form closely resembling that of the manuscript. In the latter decades of the nineteenth century a torrent of such printed books poured from Muslim presses. This flood began to abate, however, in the twentieth century, as the local printing of traditional works abated as a combination of impacts from the government vernacular schooling system, the availability of newspapers and magazines, changing print technology and offshore printing, especially in Bombay and later Cairo,\(^{30}\) all served to claw back local Muslim publishing. And this decline of Muslim publishing is in turn the main factor underlying the steady decline in global output in the early twentieth century.
INTRODUCTION

It thus makes little sense to map total printing over time. Global output needs to be understood as the confluence of independent streams of publishing activity.

PUBLISHING STREAMS

This notion of several independent streams of publishing activity fairly reflects reality. Throughout the period of the survey, publishers and printers can be assigned to one of several streams, the members of which share a social identity, a literary tradition, an audience, and a level of technology with others of the class, while at the same time sharing little or none of these with those outside the stream. At the highest level of generalisation, the streams may be conceived as:

(1) the European press, including mission and government presses and large commercial publishers operating under European or in a few cases Chinese ownership;
(2) Baba publishers, whose limited output was printed mainly on Chinese-owned commercial presses; and
(3) Muslim publishers.

Each stream is further described below.

The high degree of segmentation which characterises Malay-language printing mirrors the plural society of the Straits Settlements under colonial rule — indeed of the colonial order in general. It also reflects the technological dualism upon which that plural social order was erected. Yet in the face of these differences, all three classes of this colonial society produced Malay books, albeit of different kinds and for different purposes, thereby demonstrating the vitality of Malay as a medium of communication in this culturally diverse community.

EUROPEAN

The introduction of printed material in Malay and the technology of printing itself to the Malaysia-Singapore area was more or less coeval with colonial involvement in the area. The Dutch had introduced printing much earlier into the Netherlands Indies, and a Malay translation of the Bible had been printed as early as 1629, issued at the cost of the Dutch East India Company. But it was only in the nineteenth century that the Protestant missions launched their great evangelical enterprise using the printed word that any substantial amount of Malay material was printed. The London Missionary Society set up stations at Malacca (1815), Penang and Singapore (1819), and Batavia (1822); the Baptist Mission at Bencoolen (1818), and the American Presbyterians at Singapore (1834). All these stations were equipped with printing presses.
EARLY MALAY PRINTED BOOKS

The missions were, in modern terms, international organisations. Although they profited by association with the colonial powers and local European enterprise, they had the ability to cross political boundaries and the facilities to marshal resources across great distances. Their long arm is evident both in the texts which they put into print and in the ways in which they organised publication. Titles printed by one mission were adapted and reprinted by others. As for the process of printing, the Catholic mission in Penang sent Malay devotional works for printing in Paris and Hongkong. Protestant tracts in Malay were printed in Serampore, Madras and Cairo. Similarly the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, working in Sarawak, had books printed locally, in Singapore, and in London. Singapore's strategic location, its unsurpassed regional communications and, later, the industrial facilities it offered, together with its benign colonial administration, led to its emergence as the major regional centre for mission publishing. In the nineteenth century's early days of optimism, the first substantial printing of Thai took place in Singapore, as did the first printing of Bugis. Later, at the turn of the century the Seventh Day Adventists used Singapore to print for their mission in West Java, and the Rhenish Mission printed there for its mission to the Batak of North Sumatra. Singapore was also an important base for the largest publisher of Christian religious material, the British and Foreign Bible Society. That Society had supported the publishing of scriptures at a press operated privately by the missionary Keasberry during the 1850s to 1870s. Its major publishing effort was to begin in the 1890s, when Singapore became the major centre for its Southeast Asian publishing — though some of its Javanese printing was also done at Semarang. Under the auspices of the British and Foreign Bible Society, Singapore produced scriptures in three registers and two scripts of Malay, in the three scripts of Javanese, in Balinese, in Bicol, Melano, and Tagalog (languages of the Philippines), in Vietnamese and in Khmer. This cost-conscious Society took care in placing its printing. The type for much of its Malay and Javanese material was set up in Singapore (at the Methodist Publishing House) or in Semarang but printed at Yokohama. Thus while the Society was able to exploit its world-wide contacts to the full, Singapore remained the key to its Southeast Asian operations.

The other major branch of European printing in Malay is that undertaken by the colonial government. This was significant only in the field of education. School-books had at first been published by the mission presses, but after 1876, the production of school-books was taken up by the Government Malay Press which operated as a special unit attached to the Education Department, enjoying a substantial subsidy. A few items were also printed by the Johor Government Press, which although technically under Malay control, functioned in this regard as an instrument of the colonial administration. Later the Straits government disbanded its Malay Press, and the printing of school-books was contracted out to private European printers in Singapore who were otherwise little occupied with commercial Malay printing. Like the missions, the European commercial presses had the capacity to send printing off-shore as circumstances demanded. Presumably because of the very large print runs required, plates of the first standard reader Punca Pengetahuan 1899 etc. were prepared in Singapore by the Methodist Publishing House in Singapore and sent to London for reproduction. Conversely London publishers had Malay printed in Singapore when expertise in setting Malay in Arabic script was required, though such books were destined mainly for European hands, and were priced accordingly.

Beside the materials printed for school use, other official printing in Malay hardly deserves notice. Unlike the Netherlands Indies where the government press published extensive Malay translations of government regulations and other technical works, the Straits government took little trouble in this direction. The publication of government gazettes and enactments in Malay is more characteristic of the peninsular Malay States in the twentieth century than of the Straits Settlements, where for public purposes Malay remained merely one of three languages of practical communication — four if Tamil is included.

The importance of the mission and government presses in the history of Malay publishing lies in their relative immunity from the need to meet the expectations of a commercial audience. They did not enjoy total freedom from financial constraints of course. The missionary Keasberry operated his press on a profit-making basis, and later Shellabear too was compelled to take in commercial printing on the American Mission Press, though he grudged the time it required. The British and Foreign Bible Society followed a policy of charging a nominal price for their publications in order to guard against profligacy, though this small charge was by no means intended to recoup production costs. Even the Government Malay Press was expected to meet costs through the sale of books in the Straits Settlements and peninsular Malay states, though it was in fact unable to do so. Yet when all is said, mission and government presses were capitalised and subsidised in order that they might innovate. Their purpose was to lead their audience, even to create an audience. By the same token, their insulation from the disciplines of the market-place carried with it the risk that they would not speak to the audience to whom they were directed.

It is for this reason that the significance of early missionary publishing in the Singapore-Malaysia region is easily over-estimated. It has attracted scholarly attention because of its antiquarian interest and because it is well documented; but neither of these factors tell us anything about its effectiveness. In truth, while the long term implications of the new technology were to prove immense, its initial impact was negligible. The press itself apparently excited some interest as a novelty and some early publications have the air of experimentation: the multi-lingual Lexilogus 1841 and Pengajaran dari atas Bukit 1842 produced at Malacca and the Singapore dual-script edition of Pelayaran Abdullah 1838 with jawi and ruini on facing pages are technically interesting. But these elaborate productions were not an effective means of reaching any particular audience.

Indeed the uses to which print was put by the Christian missionaries were so often so far removed from the accustomed and limited uses of literacy in the Malay society of the day that they failed to engage their audience. The product of the early mission presses was difficult for Malay readers either to read or to understand. It was conveyed in clumsy jawi typefaces (or in an alien Roman script) “so unlike their own, and so foreign in its appearance, that they are inclined to reject it on this ground alone.” Further, it was expressed in sometimes nonsensical Malay idiom. The terms and ideas found in the early mission publications were bewildering. The Penang-based missionary printer Beighton poured immense energy into propagating observance of the Sabbath, an issue of vehemence for English Puritans, but ill-judged to strike a responsive chord in Malaya. The purveying of printed text was itself unanchored in the local environment. Christian missionary hostility to Islam sometimes aligned the local intelligentsia against the new medium. But even when this was not the case, the kind of private literacy which Christian tracts and Bible translations assumed was not found in Malaysia at that time. Literacy rates were low, and the institutions by which religious instruction was transmitted relied on the social respect accorded the teacher and his personal relationship with his pupils. The impossibility of the missionaries’ techniques unlocking a doorway into this Muslim complex was recognised by Milne, who observed that Malays could not conceive of effective prayers to God being in Malay rather than Arabic, yet if the missionaries were to preach in Arabic (assuming that lay within their competence) then very few indeed would understand them.

To attack this problem of access at its roots, the missions set up schools to teach basic literacy and numeracy. The schools were not necessarily direct instruments of propagandising, though the underlying purpose of instruction in literacy was to equip the students to read the printed word of God with, so the missionaries believed, inevitable consequences. So the missions at Singapore, Malacca, and Penang all ran schools, and printed elementary texts on spelling, reading and arithmetic, as well as catechisms which could be used as instructional material. The most successful schools seem to have been Beighton’s in Penang. Although his approach to mission work was highly polemical, his schools succeeded for a time because he bowed to local expectations by operating from mosque premises and employing Muslim teachers. When a Malay-medium program was offered in the first secular public school, the Singapore Free School, the texts used were still those prepared by the missionaries: spelling books, tracts and Bibles provided by Beighton and the American Mission Press as well as new texts worked up by the missionaries North and Keasberry. This ambitious multi-racial school, with its bizarre teaching methods, was far removed from any current local experience or expectations, and the Malay stream failed after seven years.
INTRODUCTION

Yet the work continued. Even among evangelical missions, the London Missionary Society was egregious in its reliance on the printing and circulation of books. They were no less reticent, distributing tracts in Malay and Bugis to ships anchored off Singapore “in the hope of thereby conveying the seeds of divine truth to other and distant lands.” Wide circulation was certainly achieved, but with what result can be seen by the following figures: over seven years the American mission at Singapore printed 14,000,000 pages of literature (not all in Malay) and reported the baptism of five adult Chinese. Disillusionment set in as new mission fields opened up in China, leading to the abandonment of the Malayan campaign.

Large scale mission-sponsored printing was revived only when Shellabear arrived Singapore with new printing equipment in December 1890 to establish the American Mission Press (later the Methodist Publishing House). This event marked a return to belief in the magical potency of the printed word. Shellabear had himself been converted by the chance private reading of a small printed tract entitled “A Gift, will you take it?”. After his conversion, he had prepared himself for his mission by learning the printing trade. He went on to become a prolific missionary translator and printer, undertaking large commissions for the British and Foreign Bible Society over the next two decades. The Society printed enormous numbers of Gospels and Bibles in Malay and other Southeast Asian languages to be distributed among the unenlightened by colporteurs trekking across the countryside. At least by the turn of the century print literacy was a little more widespread, and the Malay publications of this era tend to be better targeted to the linguistic preferences of the variety of Malay-using communities. The American Mission Press, under Shellabear, issued parallel versions of tracts in jawi and rumi, and designated a few as particularly written for Baba audiences.

When the British and American missions had moved on to China in the 1840s, Keasberry remained, taking over the running of the press and a mission school. It was still a small venture, but proved to have lasting influence. Keasberry’s school benefited from the increased leverage which the British now exercised in the peninsular Malay states, which enabled it to attract support moral and financial support from Malay royal houses where the Singapore Free School had failed. But ironically Keasberry’s larger success flowed from the weakness of his personal position. Keasberry was a talented individual, who after 1847 was no longer directly beholden to a home missionary society. He had thereafter to fend for himself, eventually receiving government funds for his school while supporting his missionary work through what he could make from his printery and the Malay agricultural settlement he supervised. Keasberry ran the printery as an adjunct to his school, with printing and book-binding subjects in the curriculum. Using his pupil-apprentices, Keasberry did some commercial jobbing (letterheads, bills of lading, etc.), printed Singapore’s first two Chinese newspapers, and probably produced Miskin Marakarmah 1857 on commission. Thrown thus on his own devices, Keasberry was responsible for a major initiative in Malay publishing.

That initiative was his development of the technique of lithography. Keasberry had learnt the mechanics of lithography from Medhurst in Batavia in the 1830s. Medhurst valued the technique for its flexibility and cheapness. With lithography he could print Chinese characters, Arabic script, Javanese script or anything else without the trouble and expense of casting fonts. Indeed Medhurst used lithography as a substitute for type: the meticulously inscribed jawi lithographs published in Batavia are almost indistinguishable from typeset works, so regular is the script and so faithful to the limitations of contemporary Arabic type-fonts. It was Keasberry’s responsiveness to local inclinations which led him to develop a style of lithography which imitated not the printed text, but manuscript. In so doing, he created a form which was not ungainly and alien in the eyes of literate Malays, but which deferred to accustomed scribal conventions. In 1849, Keasberry published the first of several major reference works using this new style of lithography.

These editions were a fine demonstration of the capacity of this medium to reproduce Malay text with grace and style, and in harmony with the manuscript tradition. Their effectiveness was enhanced by the fact that they were expressed in better Malay than any previous mission publications and, although their content was novel, did not evangelise directly. In getting them up, Keasberry drew heavily on the skills of Abdullah bin Abdul Kadir. In fact the first of these lithographed works was Abdullah’s autobiography, Abdullah 1849, copied in Abdullah’s own hand. Working with Abdullah, Keasberry went on to produce some beautifully decorated multi-coloured lithographs, giving a creditable imitation of the rubrication and illumination found in superior manuscripts. At the technical level, these were the first printed books which could be comfortably read by literate Malays.

Keasberry extended the reach of this technical innovation by producing a series of lithographed magazines. These presented monthly or quarterly miscellanies on Western civilisation and serialised stories. In this he revived and refined an idea which had earlier been put into action in Malacca with Bustan Arifin 1820-22, also titled The Malay Magazine. Unlike the bilingual Malay Magazine which relied on European patronage and distribution, Keasberry’s magazines were aimed unequivocally at a Malay-reading audience. His first magazines, Taman Pengetahuan 1848-51 and Pengutib Segala Remah 1852, were intended for school reading, being issued in Roman script, but they were soon accompanied by parallel versions printed in fine lithographed jawi with rubrication. In this form, the magazine could reach an audience beyond the school as well. This was also true also of Keasberry's last and finest magazine, Cermin Mata 1858-59, produced solely in jawi. This "most spectacular imprint" was crafted in beautifully decorated multi-coloured lithography.

Keasberry's innovative yet amenable printing marks not one but two turning points in the history of Malay literacy. It proved to have lasting influence both in the application of print technology and in the content and style of written Malay. On the first count, it was the first local demonstration of the potential of lithography. The immense implications of this printing technology for the Malay-Muslim commercial press are discussed below. So far as the content and style of written Malay are concerned, the influence was exercised particularly through government Malay schools.

The Straits government assumed responsibility for conducting Malay schooling in its territories in 1874, the year of the Pangkor Engagement. The government's taking a direct hand in education thus coincided with the British forward movement, which saw European political influence increase markedly in line with commercial development. During the 1890s the peninsular Malay states under British control emulated the Straits Settlements school system. The result was a rise in esteem for Western-style government schooling along with greatly expanded access to it. These developments allowed those who ran the government schooling system to wield significant cultural power, and they did so.

Within two years of its assumption of responsibility, the Straits Settlements Government had issued a range of text-books for use in the four levels (known as "standards") at which Malay education was offered. This range of books included revamped versions of the same texts which Keasberry had used in his Singapore mission schools. So, as Gallop has observed, the first grade spelling book Punca Pengetahuan published in 1876 by the Inspector of Schools bears a marked similarity in content and format with the more imaginatively titled first grade reader Teki-Teki Terbang which Keasberry had reprinted several times from 1855 to 1869. Similarly Keasberry's Ilmu Kepandaian, an introduction to Western technology, was updated and reprinted by the Johor Government Press and by Kelly and Walsh on behalf of the Straits Settlements Government as Jalan Kepandaian for use in government schools as the third standard reader. Such books remained current as texts until 1917 when Winstedt introduced what he termed the "new learning" which, besides prescribing basket weaving for Malay students, required a new range of textbooks more narrowly adapted to Malaysian conditions. But Keasberry's legacy ran wider than the prescribed standard readers, for the two other major works by Abdullah which he had promoted continued to be used in schools throughout the period of this survey, and indeed until after Independence. The journal of Abdullah’s voyage up the East Coast, Pelayaran Abdullah, first experimentally printed by North, had been reprinted several times for school use in book and magazine form by Keasberry.\(^9\) It was subsequently reprinted for use in government schools by the Straits government in 1886 and kept continuously in print thereafter. Likewise Abdullah’s autobiography, first published by Keasberry in 1849, was reprinted for the Education Department by the Royal Asiatic Society in 1880, and by the Government Press in 1888-89, and thereafter kept continuously in print. These two works, together with two Malay court texts, Sejarah Melayu and Hang Tuah, formed the heart of the Malay Literature Series, which after 1907 embodied a government-sponsored definition of worthwhile Malay literature.

The message conveyed in the early school texts had two facets. On the one hand, the essays on technology demonstrated the superiority of Western civilization. This theme was fully developed by North and especially Keasberry in collaboration with Abdullah. It underpins the publication of summaries of natural history, geography, history and technology which Keasberry put out as reference books and serialised in his magazines. New technologies are not so much explained scientifically (hardly feasible in elementary readers) as used to conjure up images of the fantastic gas-lit world of Europe or America, conveying a strongly implicit statement of the rewards of adopting Western values. These school books also pick up an implicit attack on Islam which goes back to the earliest mission printing. Ward’s Ilmu Falak 1826 gives several proofs that the world is round, ostensibly to enlighten Malays in a matter of purely scientific interest but covertly attacking prevailing Muslim cosmologies. The same essay was still doing service in the third-grade reader almost a century later in 1914.\(^9\) The second facet of the early school texts was an overt attack on Malay society. During the period of this survey, the text most frequently reprinted by mission and government alike is Abdullah’s Pelayaran Abdullah. Presented as a journal of Abdullah’s voyage up the East Coast of the peninsula, this work is in fact a concise critique of Malay society and its political institutions, comparing them unfavourably with British rule, and prescribing as the remedy the type of education the missionaries and later the government schools offered. The effect of Abdullah’s critique was magnified when the education department supplemented it with the two classical Malay court texts, Sejarah Melayu 1896 and Hang Tuah 1908. Both are set in the golden age of Malay sovereignty at Malacca, and inculcate feudal loyalty, a value which had become useful to British indirect rule. Both show Malacca at the height of its power, and conclude with its ultimate defeat at European hands. To prescribe these classical texts alongside Abdullah’s description of contemporary Malay polities was to construct a cogent case for British-guided reform.\(^9\)

Beyond these continuities of ideology, the government school books also continued to promote the new style of prose which had been pioneered by the missions. This might be characterised as unmeasured expository narrative, and

Abdullah was its prime exponent.\textsuperscript{94} His journal, \textit{Pelayaran Abdullah 1838}, the account of Western technology, \textit{Ilmu Kepandaian}, which he worked up with North, published the following year, and his autobiography, \textit{Abdullah 1849}, are unprecedented works not only in content but also in style.\textsuperscript{95} As these works were constantly reprinted for school use in the Straits Settlements, Abdullah's expository prose became a staple of European-run schools. Since its sources were in large part the translation of European journalism and, probably, Malay commercial correspondence, it was not too different from the style of early Malay newspapers, which drew on the same sources. Together, these books and the newspapers provided much of the reading material used in Straits government Malay schools.\textsuperscript{96}

This style of prose was novel, too, in being adapted to a new reading environment. It was not for enjoyment aloud, as the contemporary popular verse (\textit{syair}) and prose (\textit{hikayat}) forms were; it made no appeal to the ear, being best suited to individual reading. It is for this reason that its rise is inextricably linked with printing, for only through printing could copies of the text be produced in sufficient numbers to offer the potential for individual reading. In schools of the Western type, the new style of printed prose was taught as a skill in reading and writing to be acquired and exercised by each individual. It was expected that each pupil would have an identical printed reader before his eyes, allowing one reader to lead in turn while the others followed in their books. Reading was taught in step with composition.\textsuperscript{97} Both these practices imply the development of the skill of private, silent encoding and decoding of written text. Both were a new experience for Malay pupils, at odds with the practice of the Quran school. In the Quran school, pupils practised translating written text directly into speech — or rather, to get the emphasis right, the pupil's practice in proper oral presentation could be aided by the written form.\textsuperscript{98} If the hubbub of a Quran class struck Western observers as chaotic,\textsuperscript{99} then conversely the disciplined silence of students in a Western classroom must have struck early Malay observers as unnatural.\textsuperscript{100}

By no means was the whole of the audience for Malay literature ready to make this transition in taste and practice. Government schooling was still unevenly clustered around urban settlements. Furthermore, even though the practice of private literacy was taught in government schools, it did not automatically carry over to contexts beyond the classroom. In 1901, Wilkinson observed that "private enquiries addressed to about fifty vernacular school teachers elicited the fact that a large majority of them had never read any books except those used for their work or for devotional purposes, and that only three of them possessed more than a shillingsworth of literature in their private libraries."\textsuperscript{101} Wilkinson had reasons for painting a pessimistic picture; and took a very particular view of the proper uses of literacy, which did not include newspaper reading, for instance. Nevertheless, more than just access to schooling was necessary to engender a preference for private literacy. Since private literacy changes the social context of literary consumption, its adoption is not just a matter of the literary skills acquired by an individual, but also of the occasions and milieux in which the skill might be applied. The fact that newspapers written in the new prose continued to be enjoyed by group audiences, in coffee shops for instance, is both an adaptation of manuscript reading habits and a product of low functional literacy (and low disposable incomes) in the community. Vast differences in literacy rates and in the opportunities for literary consumption between urban and rural areas and between generations ensured that there was no uniformity in the shift in taste and practice. But by the turn of the century, newspapers and the government-sponsored school system were beginning to set the agenda of future developments.

The most explicit piece of cultural engineering undertaken by the Education Departments of the Straits Settlements and Federated Malay States was the promotion of the Roman script. In the Netherlands Indies, the Roman script (in the Dutch spelling) had become the norm for printed Malay from the middle of the nineteenth century. Most Netherlands Indies Malay-language newspapers had been printed in this script from their first appearance in 1856. By the end of the century, the Roman script found favour with the British government for the same reasons that it had flourished in the Netherlands Indies: it was easily accessible to Europeans, and it had become the form of written Malay most used by the Baba and Eurasians and other non-Muslims for whom Malay was a second language of commerce and official dealings. The first Singapore Malay-language newspaper to use Roman script was the Baba-run Bintang Timor, which first appeared in 1894. In the Straits Settlements, the audience for commercially-published rumi books lay among the Chinese, Eurasians and Indians who had been educated in mission schools, or in the government English-medium and mixed-race schools, which lent on Malay as the lingua franca of the classroom and schoolyard, and used books in Malay in the Roman script both as study aids for learning English and for the study of Malay as a second language. The Selangor Inspector of Schools believed in 1894 that knowledge of Romanised Malay more than doubled a boy’s chances of employment. In other words, the Roman script had made headway among the compradors of European interests, who were predisposed by their social and economic situation toward the cultural values and even the religion of the hegemonic culture.

Meanwhile the Muslim community and the government vernacular school system which served it remained the province of the Arabic script. It was not until the publication of a new series of rumi readers in 1897 to 1899 that the Roman script was introduced into the Malay vernacular school curriculum. The plan was to begin with mainly jawi in the lower standards and to place increasing emphasis on rumi in the higher standards. Change in the Malay states was slower, with rumi taught in all standards in Perak only in 1906. The standard rumi readers were at first supplemented by reprints of several Roman-script books which had been used in the Netherlands Indies, changing their spelling to conform to the English-based Straits Government standard. But a more sustained push for Roman literacy came in 1907 with the decision taken by the Federated Malay States government on Wilkinson’s advice to sponsor a series of worthwhile Malay reading material printed in the Roman script, the Malay Literature Series. The argument for the new Series was that if sufficient worthwhile literature was not available, the Roman script would fail to appeal to Malays because of shallowness of cultural experience it conveyed. Malays would then remain captives of the unwholesome commercial book market, which failed to propagate what Wilkinson and other European scholars identified as true Malay values. (This meant, as we shall see, that the commercial press did not inculcate deference to Malay rulers’ status and respect for British power.) However the push in favour of Romanisation was not immediately successful, and the imperative for promoting acceptable values was achieved through the reissue of a few key items in the series — Pelayaran Abdullah (again!), Abdullah, Hang Tuah, and Sejarah Melayu — in parallel jawi editions. It was in the form of these jawi editions that Sejarah Melayu and Hang Tuah gained the status of classics of Malay literature in the minds of two generations of culturally-disoriented Malays attending government schools.

To summarise: in form, style and content the European press regularly failed to meet contemporary audience expectations of literature. Very few of its products would have survived as commercial propositions; they depended on financial subsidy or support from powerful social institutions. But from this position of privilege they were able to influence Malay literate culture, drawing it in the direction of the West — that is, in the direction of a literate culture conformable with higher rates of literacy and new ideas of individual participation in reading and writing. If audiences did not exist, they could be created through the same agencies which operated to create new levels of literacy. Wilkinson was guilty of self-deception when he argued that in conditions of rapid change, the government school system (and implicitly the literature it taught) acted as a conservative force.

The sudden establishment of a modern settlement in an old-world community such as that of the Malays brings about great social changes. ... The effacing of the old social landmarks brought about a demoralisation which it should be the object of public instruction to combat. 114

The reality was that his school system and the uses of literacy which it taught were capable of inducing severe cultural disorientation. When the high iconic text of Malay feudalism, Sejarah Melayu, is included in the Malay Literature Series, giving unprecedented circulation to a text which, in its manuscript form, had been the preserve of the royal houses — and when this is done as a means of popularising the new Roman script favoured by colonial government and commercial interests, — then it is not, as Winstedt snidely suggests, incomprehensible that student teachers at the Malay College should believe that text they had been given to study had been written by its editor, the missionary Shellabear. 115

BABA

The second stream of Malay-language publication is the publication of books for Chinese whose mother tongue was a dialect of Malay. As Figure 2 above shows, Baba publication has always been the poor relation in Singapore-Malaysian book publishing.

A small number of books for a Baba audience were published by non-Chinese. One instance is the anthology of recreational reading, Lautan Akal 1907+, put out by a Penang-born Jawi Peranakan. 116 Another non-Chinese source of Baba books was of course Christian mission publications, the most noteworthy being Bible: Matthew 1896 and translations made, under Shellabear’s supervision, of the New Testament, The Pilgrim’s Progress, and Black Beauty. 117

But understandably most Baba literature was published by Chinese. 118 This was always an ad hoc affair. None of the Chinese printers of Baba literature were primarily book publishers. Typically, printing was undertaken on the order of the author by a Chinese commercial press — such as the Kim Seck Chye Press of Singapore. 119 It fell to the author to act as publisher, to finance and distribute the work. Lau Say, the translator of Sun Pang 1904-06, travelled to Malacca and Kuala Lumpur hawking his serialised translation and taking orders. 120 With a touch of melodrama, Chan Kim Boon, the translator of five multi-volume historical romances, informed his readers that he faced bankruptcy if his most ambitious venture did not succeed. 121 There was not sufficient sustained output to support an established market for Baba books or a distribution network. Authors had to rely on acquaintances among general merchants to handle their books, resulting in irrational patterns of distribution. Zheng Dong 1895, for instance, was sold through three agents in Singapore, one in Malacca, one in Saigon, but none in Penang. In fact, the distribution arrangements for Baba books were generally so poor that they rarely extended beyond Singapore. Altogether agents are listed 49 times in 17 books. Of the 49, fully 41 have addresses within the Singapore town limits. Another 3 are located in Malacca, which for Singapore Babas was virtually an outlying suburb. Even more remarkable is that only two Singapore-published books list agents in Penang. There is no any mention of any Penang sales in the detailed information on how six hundred volumes of Sun Pang 1904-06 were sold. Since virtually all the Baba books in this survey were printed in Singapore, Baba book publishing emerges as a phenomenon very strongly focussed in Singapore.

Beside the limited amount of Baba literature published in Singapore there was a vastly greater literature in Romanised Malay produced by the Chinese Peranakan of Java. It is difficult to gauge how much access the Baba of the Straits Settlements enjoyed to this treasury. Reportedly Chan Kim Boon, whose father traded with Sumatra, had become interested in translating Chinese historical novels into Baba Malay after seeing that Indonesian translations of such novels were selling well in Malaya. The first burst of activity in such translation occurred in the early 1880s in Batavia, preceding parallel Singapore versions by half a decade. The differences in spelling conventions would not have been a great barrier. Ilmu Nasib 1897, which specifies its spelling and script as 'huruf Inggris', nevertheless anticipates circulation in Batavia, Deli, and Padang Panjang, as well as Singapore and Penang, though it is untypical in this regard. Conversely three works were printed in Singapore in the Netherlands Indies spelling, but by authors from the Netherlands Indies.

A sign of what a small pond the Singapore Baba literature made is that it was possible for a single writer to achieve a dominating role, as Chan Kim Boon did. Chan was born in Penang and educated in both English and Chinese, attending the Penang Free School and the Foochow Naval School. He moved to Singapore in 1872 to work in a lawyer's office. There, writing under the nom de plume 'Batu Gantong', he translated five Chinese historical romances, his major work being a 30-volume translation of the Romance of the Three Kingdoms. At one time he had in prospect a further sixteen or so translations, but pointed out that his further work depended upon the viability of his main project, the translation of the Three Kingdoms. By the time he had reached volume 22 of this immense undertaking, he rued his earlier ambition, stating that "because this translation of the Story of the Three Kingdoms has demanded so much brain-wracking exertion, I wish to announce with apologies that I have not the strength to translate any further Chinese stories." However, he did go on at a slower pace to translate two further romances, the Water Margin (Song Jiang 1899-1902) and the Journey to the West (Xiyou Ji 1911-13), so that by 1913 he had published some 9,000 pages of printed text. In the period of this survey, more than half of all Baba fiction flowed from the pen of this one man.

As well as being limited in bulk, Chinese-published Baba literature was confined to a rather narrow repertoire. This comprised principally translations from Hokkien Chinese into Baba Malay of cerita dahulukala, that is of popular Chinese novels or tongsu xiashuo, based on the exploits of folk heroes — the most famous being the Romance of the Three Kingdoms (San Guo), and the Water Margin (Song Jiang). Altogether twenty such titles were published in Singapore, all in Roman script, the earliest appearing in 1889. These constitute a new genre in Malay without precedent in the older manuscript tradition. Yet while new to Malay, they have deep roots in Chinese popular culture. They were the stock-in-trade of itinerant story tellers and provided episodes for the renowned Wayang Macau (Cantonese Opera), which was exceedingly well patronised by the Chinese and all other communities in Malaya at the turn of the century.

The rediscovery and translation of these historical romances was part of a redefinition of Baba identity. In the latter part of the nineteenth century, the Baba community was adapting to both the rise of British capital and to more intense exposure to China. Ever larger numbers of new arrivals from China and the great improvements in communications which allowed Chinese of all linguistic backgrounds to follow current events in China tended to make the Baba more self-conscious participants in both Malay and Chinese cultures. Analogous developments were occurring elsewhere in the Chinese diaspora, and in the Netherlands Indies the Chinese Peranakan had a substantial Malay-language literature by the turn of the century, including slightly earlier translations of the popular historical romances also published in Singapore.

Prior to this Baba renaissance, Malay-speaking Chinese had been participants in Malay oral and manuscript literature. Their contribution to supposedly traditional Malay manuscript literature is not susceptible to disaggregation. Earlier in the nineteenth century, Chinese were among those who showed an interest in jawi publications put out by the missions. They are believed to have been associated with the operation of manuscript lending libraries in Batavia, Palembang and probably elsewhere, but the materials stocked by the libraries which have been studied seem not to diverge from the popular tastes of a Malay readership. It is known that syair tales like Abdul Muluk and Zubaidah were favourites with Chinese readers, but so they were with ethnically Malay readers too. This older literary orientation was losing ground late in the nineteenth century when Baba works begin to appear in print. Nevertheless a few publications do reflect the older affinities. Among them, the interesting religious works published at Palembang (though printed in Singapore), Yuli Baochao 1877 and Wenchang Dijun 1882, which emanate from a Chinese community still reading Malay in the jawi script. Published in the Roman script, but exhibiting a deference to Islamic popular tradition is the peculiar Ilmu Nasib 1897, apparently edited by a Chinese Muslim.
INTRODUCTION

Another embodiment of Baba participation in Malay-language literary expressions are the collections of pantun enjoyed in musical soirées by Baba Chinese and ethnic Malays alike. The major collection, Dondang Sayang 1911-16, is tailored to such use by grouping pantun thematically and listing suitable violin accompaniments. In the period of this survey, printed pantun collections are a peculiarity of the Baba and European scholars. It is interesting that the earliest printed collection of pantun, Pantun Karang-Karangan 1889, was edited by a Chinese Muslim.

However the terms of Baba participation in Malay culture began to change as the Baba, always a comprador class, adjusted to a new hegemonic culture under British rule. Symptomatic of this accommodation are an interest in English education (as indeed English began to displace Malay as the Baba mother tongue) and the whole-hearted adoption of Roman script for writing Malay. The complexity of the new adjustment is conveyed in the form and content of the new Baba published literature. It is a new genre of literature in Malay, expressed specifically in the Baba dialect, printed in the English script, on subjects dear to Chinese popular culture. The multiple linguistic orientation of the Baba community is also conveyed by the explanatory notes added to the translations of the historical romances, which may give equivalents to court titles and kinship terminology, for instance, in Chinese, Baba Malay, and Johor Malay. Indeed a keen linguistic self-consciousness is evident in these works, which stems only in part from the fact of their being translations. Sensitivity to the varieties of Malay springs also from the unstandardised nature of Baba Malay, which until the advent of print had no separate literary tradition.

Yet while it is interesting to see how a new Malay-language literature could thus serve to reinforce Chinese identity, it was increasingly English that was favoured by this comprador class. The shift in favour of English is reflected in linguistic works. In this category, nineteenth century guides to Malay for Chinese speakers designed to equip newcomers with the linguistic skills of the Baba give way to twentieth century guides to English for Malay-speaking Chinese. In a letter to the translator of San Guo 1892-96, a correspondent, writing in English, reveals the close affinity in his mind between reading English and Malay in the Roman script: "I wish to mention to you that nearly all the Chinese Babas of Penang, who can read English, and who do not know the story of Sam Kok in Chinese, are very glad to read these books of yours, and spend most of their leisure in reading the said books." The same work contains English poetry, definitions of Chinese terms in English, English-language novelties, like a list of ten words of great length in English, even bilingual sentences. Translation into Malay could be seen as lacking the prestige attached to the colonial language. Chan Kim Boon's Three Kingdoms received faint praise from one correspondent, who wrote: "It is a work that should appeal to every Straits-born Chinese man, and perhaps more so the Chinese ladies, many of whom are not yet sufficiently advanced to appreciate English literature."\textsuperscript{151} In the last volume of the last work Chan translated into Malay is a rather sad epitaph to his massive literary endeavour. There he published a letter from his nephew asserting that his uncle would gain greater fame if his translations were into English.\textsuperscript{152}

More than the books of any other stream of Malay-language publishing, Baba books are remarkable for their appeal to the eye. This is immediately evident in the profusion of illustrations accompanying the translations of the historical romances. The main characters and sometimes incidents in the unfolding story are illustrated in these typeset books with interleaved or appended lithographic pages. Such illustration, found in a majority of Baba books, is very rare in Malay-language publishing overall. Among the handful of non-Baba illustrated books the foremost are, interestingly, translations of works which became popular through stage performances mounted by the commercial theatre.\textsuperscript{153} In these instances the illustrations might have been a way of reviving visual memories of the stage performance, a function which illustrations in the Baba translations would certainly have shared. The illustrations included in the Baba translations echo the strong graphic tradition of the popular literature from which they were translated.\textsuperscript{154} It is also noticeable that although the illustrations included in the Baba translations are lithographed, they are drawn in the style of wood-cuts, the traditional form of illustration in Chinese xylographic printing. Realising the appeal of illustrations to Baba readers, Shellabear used illustrations of the main incidents in his Baba version of Pilgrim's Progress to give the story a Chinese setting, though he did not try to replicate the wood-cut style.\textsuperscript{155}

But it is not only through illustrations that Baba books address the reader's eye. The typography of the Baba translations is most complex. One of the earlier translations, \textit{San Guo} 1889, opens with an outline of typographic conventions which will be used in the book, informing readers further that the contents of letters will be printed in italics and that numbers in brackets refer to the illustrations. Evident here are both typographic coding and manipulation of the structure of the printed book. The typography could be complex indeed. On a page of \textit{San Guo} 1892-96 may be found four type fonts, italics, parentheses, small caps, double and single inverted commas, daggers and asterisks, interspersed with Chinese characters.\textsuperscript{156} The title pages of Baba translations were riotous displays of fancy typefaces, reminiscent of advertising hand-bills. And indeed this typographic excess was feasible because the books were printed at commercial presses which customarily produced advertising material of this kind. But the reasons for typographic variation may lie deeper, if it is true that for Chinese literate in the logographic script (which would include the translators and the press operators) "European script produces ... the same impression of monotony and lack of distinctiveness that [Europeans] might experience if faced with pages printed entirely in the dots and dashes of morse code".\textsuperscript{157} Whatever the explanation, the effect is a visual one. This extends beyond typefaces. The page layout was also structured, with running head, text and footnotes, as was the organization of the book itself. Chapter headings and subheadings abound. The front cover of Erdu Mei 1889 details the number of parts, number of pages, number of illustrations, number of pages including illustrations, and the presence of an index. All this information on organisation, structure and typography, assumes that the book will be read in a certain way. Since most of this is visual information, most of which cannot be translated into words, it conveys meaning to readers, not to listeners. This is not to deny that the Baba romances were read aloud; indeed colophons mention listening as well as reading,158 and books of this kind were recommended for reading aloud in the family circle.159 But the emphasis on visual communication is especially evident in ancillary elements. The cartoons, maps of war movements, mathematical puzzles, play with Chinese characters, and much else included in San Guo 1892-96160 cannot be taken in by ear. All this suggests the primacy of individual reading over listening. This is emphasised by some structural features. Indexes, glossaries, cross-referencing to plates, and tabulated information161 imply not only visual consumption, but non-sequential reading. Flipping back and forth through pages, or alternating between text and footnotes, is only compatible with individual reading.

The Baba books have other qualities which are associated with private literacy. One is the salience of the author or translator. Intimate information about the author-translator’s personal circumstances was vouchsafed to readers when this was quite incidental to the theme of the book. Chan Kim Boon, for instance, not only told readers of his trials and tribulations in arranging the publication of his works, related his financial woes, and bewailed his fourth son’s typhoid fever, but also provided photographs of himself and his assistants, introduced his eldest son and published his son’s drawings.162 Lau Say, as we have seen, detailed his travels promoting his books, and Na Tian Piet, in his syair in praise of Sultan Abu Bakar, not only included an autobiographical introduction and a photograph of himself but advised readers who doubt the veracity of his account to confirm it with his son, who was a clerk in Robinson’s, the well-known department store in Singapore.163 Tan Beng Teck is less assertive,164 but in the main there is no hiding of one’s light under a bushel.

Another distinctive characteristic of the Baba press is its proclivity for serialisation. In this it prefigures the modern form of the magazine. In part serialisation can be understood as a predictable consequence of the combination of long texts and struggling publishers.165 (The hope was that early sales would finance the printing of later volumes. In practice, however, the author-publishers and their financial backers had to carry considerable stock.)166 But beyond these economic factors, the serial format seems to have been attractive in its own right. It is hard to imagine any other reason why Zhuang Zixu 1889, a slight work amounting to some sixty pages, should have been issued in six parts. Other Baba books were also issued serially: the Dondang Sayang 1911-16, 1915-16 pantun collections (in five instalments), and an anthology of recreational reading Lautan Akal 1907+ (in four parts). The contents of the latter work recall other Baba anthologies of recreational reading, comprising fantastic, topical or humorous stories in prose. Examples are Jingu Qiguan 1889, and the later Rencana Piatu 1916, and Abu Nawas 1916, 1917 with Cerita Rampai-Rampai 1916. It is a small step from a serialised anthology like Lautan Akal 1907+ to the more modern magazine. It is interesting to observe how the long-running serialisation of San Guo 1892-96 took on the aspect of a fixed-term magazine. It began as fairly straight monthly instalments of the translation but soon took on some of the qualities of a magazine, running a bonus anthology of humorous and amazing stories alongside the main feature, and including news reports on the disastrous progress of the Sino-Japanese war, along with a miscellany of medicinal recipes, brain teasers, jokes and the like. A further approximation to the magazine is the interaction set up between reader and editor, and between reader and reader, through the publication of readers' letters commenting upon previous issues. Chan Kim Boon welcomed, indeed orchestrated, such contributions.

The inclination to serialise is almost wholly confined to Baba publishing throughout the period of this survey. A number of multi-volume works were published by both European and Muslim presses, but only four were serialised. The more common practice of Muslim publishers was to issue long texts either in single very large volumes or in simultaneously released multi-volume sets. The financial advantage accruing from serialisation would have been just as welcome to poorly capitalised Muslim publishers as it was to Baba author-publishers. Why then did Baba publishers so frequently serialise, and Muslim publishers so rarely? There are, I believe, several answers. One is simply that supplying regular instalments of a serial was quite feasible if nearly all the customers lived in Singapore town. It seems that this was more or less true of Baba book-buyers, but we shall see that it was certainly not the case for purchasers of Muslim books. Another factor is that the serialised Baba publications were appearing in Malay for the first time, whereas the long texts issued by Muslim publishers were almost all established in the manuscript tradition before print. Some of the Baba serials were therefore published in instalments as the translation proceeded. This was not only a practical work process, but it also gave purchasers the sense that they were sharing in a contemporary experience which they shared uniquely with other purchasers of the serial. A sense of audience solidarity could be reinforced by devices like the publishing of letters from readers discussing reactions to previous instalments. This solidary potential can be generated by serialisation only with newly available material. If a text is already in the public domain, the psychological dynamic actuated by serialisation is weak. It is interesting that two of the handful of works serialised by Muslim publishers have this quality of novelty; namely, Alf Lailah wa Lailah 1878-79 and Quran: al-Kitab
INTRODUCTION

1920. The attraction of the serial form to Baba readers may well also be a by-product of their familiarity with newspaper reading, which provided similar psychological rewards. In any case, it is a novel use of the print medium.

MUSLIM

The third stream of publishing activity is labelled 'Muslim'. As with the other streams, this category relates to the agents who produced printed works, and not necessarily to the subject matter of the publications. Thus this stream encompasses the printing undertaken by Malay, Javanese, Jawi Peranakan, and other printers who share a common Muslim identity. Not all their publications were overtly Islamic, but a great many were. For the whole period of this survey, Singapore Muslim publishing surpassed the European stream in the number of editions issued, and in the variety of texts committed to print. It could not, however, match government and mission presses in terms of pure bulk.

The Muslim publishing so defined and included in this survey offers important insights into the cultural ecology of the Singapore-Malaysia region and beyond. Its particular interest springs from a combination of two factors. One is the early rise of Singapore to a dominant position in Muslim publishing in Southeast Asia. The other is the changing relationship of Muslim printing to the nineteenth century Malay manuscript tradition, which was extended and transformed by the introduction of printing.

The earliest Muslim printing in the region dates back to at least 1854. In that year a Muslim from Palembang purchased a lithographic press in Singapore and began printing copies of the Quran with introduction and notes in Malay. The next firmly identified and dated Muslim printing appears in Singapore in 1860. During the following decade nineteen Malay titles are known to have been put out by Singapore Muslim printers. A few Muslim religious texts were also printed in Java from the late 1850s and early 1860s, but there is no evidence of the burgeoning commercial printing which characterised Singapore. Beyond the archipelago, Muslim printing in Malay arrives later. Malay books were printed in Bombay as early as 1874. In Mecca, Snouck Hurgronje found the earliest Malay-language works available there had been printed in 1876 and 1880 in Bombay and possibly in Cairo. The printing press at Mecca began issuing Malay language works only in 1884. Singapore thus emerges early as the leading centre of Muslim publishing in Southeast Asia during the nineteenth century, and as the first centre of Malay-language Muslim printing anywhere in the world.

Muslim publication developed in a field previously the domain of the Malay manuscript literary culture. In this it differs from Baba printing as well as from most of the innovative and intrusive mission and school printing. The second is that throughout its evolution it has been a commercial enterprise. The European press, we have seen, operated at the discretion of publishers who needed to pay little heed to their audience, indeed who had an agenda for changing the taste and composition of the audience and ample means to support the endeavour. The Baba press was commercial in an embryonic way, lacking sustained output and marketing networks. In contrast to both of those other categories, the Muslim press was a sustained commercial enterprise in the hands of poorly capitalised commercial printers and booksellers, whose survival depended on their ability to sell what their customers wanted. Consequently the Muslim press gives us a much clearer impression of popular reading habits and the realities of cultural entrepreneurship.

REPERTOIRE

It was the custom of the Muslim publishers and booksellers to classify their books into the three broad classes of kitab, hikayat and syair. The former two categories were not hard and fast: the term kitab is replaced by surat in some cases, as is hikayat by ceritera, kitab, and occasionally surat, only syair form a truly distinctive category by virtue of their characteristic verse form. But in general the three broad classes are used consistently and may be taken to represent meaningful categories in the minds of those who sold books, and presumably of those who read them too.

The class kitab encompasses books used for all kinds of study and reference. Most often it refers to books dealing with the recitation and study of the Quran, prayer, theology, religious law and ancillary matters. In a broader sense, it may also include reference books of a general nature, such as letter-writers, vocabularies and school books.\(^{178}\)

Kitab of the former kind, treating religious subjects, launched the early Muslim press. For the first decade of Singapore Muslim printing from 1860-1870, the majority of the titles published were basic religious texts such as might be studied under an advanced teacher in a pondok-pesantren. Kitab appearing in this first decade were, in order of appearance, Sabil al-Muhtadin, Bidayat al-Mubtadi, Usul al-Din, Tanbih al-Ikhwan, Sirat al-Mustakim, Kawaid al-Islam, and Taj al-Muluk. Also figuring among the earliest output of Muslim printers were two popular Islamic guides in verse form, Syair Mekkah, a guide to the pilgrimage, and Syair Hakikat, a collection of moral advice for the young. This list of kitab corresponds quite closely with a short list of the religious works most favoured among the Malays in the first half of the nineteenth century which is given by Newbold, probably based on information from Abdullah bin Abdul Kadir. All the works in Newbold's list are known to have been published during the first two decades of printing activity in Singapore, several in two editions.\(^{179}\) Brumund confirms that Sirat al-Mustakim was the foremost kitab used by Javanese 'priests' mid-century.\(^{180}\)
INTRODUCTION

In later decades, the number of kitab published in Singapore increases steadily to peak at about 1900. During the 1890s some 38 kitab are known to have been printed. These included works in Malay and Javanese, sometimes in the form of an Arabic text with interlinear Malay or Javanese glosses, or what is known in Javanese as the 'bearded' (jenggotan) format. In these works Javanese is written in the modified Arabic script (pegon), almost invariably with all vowelling indicated: in only a couple of instances is the text 'bald' (gundil). Between 1890 and 1910 nearly twenty such Javanese kitab were published in Singapore.

The heavy weighting towards works of religious instruction indicates an important impetus for the establishment of an Islamic press. As many of these kitab were works of considerable bulk, their production was a major undertaking. In the early decades of Muslim printing they undoubtedly formed the greater part of the printed output of Muslim publishers. Indeed, they remained a staple activity of Singapore Muslim publishers throughout the period of the survey. It is doubtful though that the printing of kitab was a very profitable undertaking, and indeed it may not have been intended to be so. It is suggestive that the first kitab definitively printed in Singapore happens to have been printed as a charitable bequest (wakaf), a practice which continued throughout the period.

But it is in the publication of syair and hikayat that the commercial face of Muslim printing is most clearly shown. If we consider not the bulk of printing but the number of editions coming from the presses, already by the 1870s the majority were syair and hikayat. This trend continued, so that even at the peak of kitab printing in the 1890s a vastly greater number of new and reprinted syair and hikayat were being issued, to the extent that the extensive kitab production was overshadowed. The highest turnover for indigenous publishers clearly lay in the recreational area. The ten most frequently reissued titles were seven syair—(in order) Abdul Muluk, Siti Zubaidah, Haris Fadhillah, Juragan Budiman, Unggas, Kiamat, Dagang, and three hikayat—Miskin Marakarmah, Muhammad Hanafiah, and Dermah Tahsiah.

Syair were undoubtedly the most popular form of literature in the nineteenth century. So popular was this genre that works of prose were versified to supply the easy reading for which the public clamoured. The language of this popular genre is more direct, less inflected, and has shorter and simpler syntactic structures than is characteristic of prose. Thus, although syair are marked by some poetic conventions in the choice of vocabulary (especially in finding rhyme words), their language is in general closer to common speech than is the rather artificial style of traditional literary prose. The result is a more effective vehicle for conveying information to a wide audience than were the contemporary forms of prose.
EARLY MALAY PRINTED BOOKS.

Nor must it be forgotten that, in these early days of print, written works were intended to be read aloud, in the manner of the manuscript. Both prose and verse were consumed more often by ear than by eye. The simple predictability of the syair's structure was a great aid to aural comprehension, as well as supporting musical accompaniment. Syair were to be read aloud with vigour and style, according to the concluding verses of one moderately popular text:

membaca dia jangan pelahan suara yang elok jangan ditahan supaya dengar taman dan kawan

The audience revels in the sweet voice of the singer. If his or her rendition is not dull but lively and polished, the reciter may look forward to tokens of appreciation — tea, cigarettes, and sweets:

jangan dibaca perlahan-lahan supaya terdengar orang sekalian baca olehmu dengan petua semuanya suka sambil tertawa dapatlah upahan teh dan kahwa serta rokok pangan nan halwa

Such readings were a common form of evening entertainment. Furthermore the most popular syair are known to have been performed as theatre, among them Abdul Muluk, Siti Zubaidah, and Ken Tabuhan — as well as the prose Miskin Marakarmah.

Also read aloud publicly were texts of religious significance. Foremost among these are accounts of the Prophet's life, in the various versions known as Maulud, and the very frequently reprinted prose epic Hikayat Muhammad Hanafiah. The latter is a popular account of the birth, life and death of prophet Muhammad, and of the violent and tragic story of Ali and his sons Hassan, Hussain and Muhammad Hanafiah. It was read publicly during the ten days of Asyura. It opens with an explicit address to both readers and listeners, printed on its title page.

Highest on the list of titles which appealed most to book-buyers were romantic adventures. The syair Abdul Muluk, Siti Zubaidah, Haris Fadhillah, Juragan Budiman, and the hikayat Miskin Marakarmah are all of this nature. These tales are rich in pathos and catharsis. They draw on conventional themes of the separation of lovers, the birth of a child of good fortune in forest exile, the intermediacy of a fairy god-mother or forest hermit, episodes of disguise and mistaken identity, all culminating in a battle in which a lost kingdom is regained, the lovers are reunited, and prosperity and happiness return. A popular additional ingredient is the depiction of the strong heroine who, through steady devotion, wit, resourcefulness and valour on the battle-field, rescues her husband from captivity. This is common to all four of the most popular syair. Miskin Marakarmah is rather different. It shares the love of disguise and revelations of true identity, the fairy godmother, the loss and regaining of a kingdom, the ups and downs of fortune, and the hero saved from an ogre by his wife-to-be; but the focus is on adventures of the prince. With Dermah Tasiah the woman’s role is again foremost: a wife suffers grievously when driven out by her husband but remains steadfast in great tribulation and is returned to her husband by Jibrail with admonitions against divorce. It is worth remarking that the titles of Zubaidah, Juragan Budiman, and Dermah Tasiah are all provided by the names of their heroines.197

These most popular syair are also notable for their strongly Islamic flavour. Although drawing upon themes which are common to a stock of Malay and Javanese literature, they are distinguished by their setting, which is not in the mythical Anta Beranta (as is Miskin Marakarmah), nor in Janggala and Kuripan (as is Ken Tabuhan), but in imagined Muslim worlds centred on Barbary and Hindustan or Iraq, Yunan and Cambay. Even more weight is lent to this Islamic colouring by the didactic works which also figure among the most popular printed texts. The titles of Syair Unggas Bersoal Ilmu Akhirat and Syair Kiamat indicate the didactic nature of the texts. The remaining text in the top ten, Syair Dagang, is an allegorical poem by the early Malay mystic Hamzah Fansuri expressing the spiritual pilgrim’s lonely anguish.

The popularity these works achieved in the market place indicates the appeal of their style and, no doubt, the values they convey. The Islamic horizons of most of these books, the social values their stories embody, and the mercantile environment which they often depict or assume, — these must be seen as aspects of a popular Islamic culture which flourished where these books were sold.

MARKETING

Like Baba and European printing in the British-protected areas of the archipelago, Muslim printing was concentrated in Singapore. Unlike Baba and European printing, however, Muslim printing was distributed from Singapore throughout the archipelago. Singapore was the hub of native shipping movements throughout the archipelago and a collection point for the pilgrimage to Mecca. These factors, and the laissez-faire disengagement of the British administration from cultural affairs, led to the emergence of Singapore as the focal point of Muslim culture in Southeast Asia.198

From earliest times, Singapore Muslim printing was concentrated on the north-eastern outskirts of the town in Kampung Gelam199 around the Sultan Mosque, and in particular in the short street running down from the main gate of the mosque, then known in Malay as Lorong Masjid Sultan and in English as Sultan Road, but now called Bussorah Street.200 Other printers’ shops adjoined in Baghdad Street, a block to the north in North Bridge Road, or further to the south-west in Arab Street, Haji Lane and Bali Lane. At its peak, Muslim printing was concentrated in the hands of printers in adjoining or closely adjacent shops just outside the gate of Sultan Mosque. It was of course in this area that the community gathered on Fridays, and in this area too that the pilgrims using Singapore as a stopover in their course to Mecca congregated. This was a neighbourhood of bustling commercial activity whose shops then, as now, specialised in tailoring, and selling cloth and religious accoutrements. These included imports from India, the Middle East, and beyond. Merchandise included everything from songkok and haji caps, to Kashmiri cloths and tweeds, to medicines and imported perfumes, as well as printed goods: amulets (azimat), printed verses and formulae (wafak), pictures of religious scenes and portraits of contemporary Muslim leaders (gambar). The leading publisher, Haji Muhammad Said, advertises that he not only sells books of various kinds but undertakes book binding, and takes orders for jackets cut in the Turkish style, does copper inlay work, and sells a range of medicines concocted by a friend. In this context, a book is a luxury consumer item.

In his study of the periodical press in Singapore, Roff noted that this branch of publishing was largely in the hands of Jawi Peranakan, that is acculturated Muslims of Indian extraction. This is not true of the Muslim book press. Jawi Peranakan publishers made a small contribution rather late in the evolution of the press, notably through the Jawi Peranakan Press and the Denodaya Press (which put out Baba as well as Tamil and Malay works). But these were peripheral. Rather, it was publishers of Javanese extraction who dominated. The imperfect evidence we have tells us that more than half the individuals known to be Muslim Malay-language publishers in Singapore were Javanese immigrants or of Javanese ancestry. More specifically they hailed from the Javanese north coast pasisir, from the region about Semarang. Others, whose ancestry is not clear, worked closely in cooperation with Javanese publishers. In fact the role of the Javanese is greater than suggested merely by the ethnic background of individual publishers, for the known Javanese publishers also tended to be more prolific. Of the top four publishers, three are Javanese. Foremost was a family headed by Haji Muhammad Said b. Haji Muhammad Arsyad of Semarang. Haji Muhammad Said and his sons account for about 200 editions published over a period of 45 years from 1873 to 1918. The second most prolific publisher, Haji Muhammad Siraj b. Haji Muhammad Salih of Rembang put out about 80 editions over much the same period. Haji Muhammad Taib b. Haji Muhammad Zain of Pati Negara was responsible for 53 editions. Yet at this time Javanese made up only about one-fifth of the Singapore Muslim population. The Javanese community were exceeded in numbers by the Kling (Tamil Muslims), and by a more stable population of less urbanized Malays. Evidently book publishing was disproportionately the preserve of the Javanese community in Singapore.

Retail sales of books were made directly from the publisher’s premises, which were in some cases substantial bookshops. There are often exhortations at the end of published books inviting readers to come to the publisher's premises to buy books then currently in stock or still in the press, promising competitive prices,208 clear print and strong covers.209 Haji Muhammad Said kept about 100 titles in stock in his shop;210 Haji Muhammad Amin kept closer to 200 titles in stock;211 the largest Singapore retailer, Haji Muhammad Siraj, advertised 120 titles in a catalogue in 1897-98, but this was far from a complete listing of his stock.212

Direct retail sales were also possible through the mails. The use of mail order became more feasible late in the nineteenth century as the reach and variety of postal services between the Straits Settlements and the Federated Malay States, Johor, and the other unfederated states improved, with the parcel post in 1884, money orders in 1885, and the move to carriage by rail during the 1890s and 1900s. Services between the Straits Settlements and the Netherlands Indies improved in parallel, with the Netherlands Indies post office opening special branches in Penang and Singapore in 1878.213 As the mails carried the first Malay newspapers, they also carried advertisements by booksellers, with instructions for ordering by mail. Haji Muhammad Siraj b. Salih developed this marketing technique to its fullest. His regular and extensive advertisements in Jawi Peranakan in the years 1889-91 detail prices, postage costs, and give instructions on how to order by mail. He also advertised these facilities in free book catalogues which were sent on request to any inquirer. The mail-order instructions from his 1897-98 catalogue are informative:

The kitab, hikayat, syair and newspapers listed in this catalogue may be bought for the prices listed beside each title, paid in cash. Customers abroad wishing to buy these books should forward payment in advance together with the postal charges listed alongside each price. Money from abroad may be sent as bank orders or postal money orders as well as in the form of currency notes. We definitely do not accept stamps as payment for books. Money sent from anywhere in Java, Sumatra or other places using Dutch currency should be converted at the rate of 1.25 Javanese rupiahs to 1 Singapore dollar. All correspondence and payments should be sent to the address given above. Alternatively, the address in English is: H.M. Sirat, 43 Sultan Road, Singapore.214

Publishers also used agents to sell books on their behalf. The extreme case of this system of marketing was developed by the Penang publisher Haji Putih b. Syaikh Abu Basyir. In Bustamam 1895 he listed 17 agents, covering the west coast of the Malay Peninsula, Aceh, the east coast of Sumatra, Singapore, and south-west Kalimantan; two years later in Ganja Mara 1897 he had 26 agents, extending the net to Bangkok as well.215 Another Penang publisher had an agent in Colombo.216 In Singapore it was again Haji Muhammad Siraj b. Salih who has the best developed network of agents, with representatives in Johor, Muar, Malacca, Penang, Deli, Sandakan, Batavia217 and later also in Taiping and the Kinta. In most cases the agents would have taken orders rather than stocking a range of books.

Among the booksellers' agents were vernacular school inspectors, the so-called 'visiting teachers'. These rare individuals bridged the intellectual worlds of the government vernacular school and the Quran school and pondok-pesantren alongside which many government schools had developed. One such dextrous figure was Syaikh Nasir b. Ahmad Bakhdhar of Perak. He was an agent for both Haji Putih in Penang and Haji Muhammad Siraj b. Salih in Singapore. He was highly regarded by the colonial educational authorities, who promoted him to head the Teacher Training College at Taiping, while at the same time he personally arranged the reprinting of Majmuk al-Fawaid, a compendium of Islamic teachings which might be used in the more advanced Quran schools.

The government provided free vernacular education but pupils were expected to buy their own textbooks. Booksellers like Haji Muhammad Siraj might supply them in lots to teachers for resale to their pupils. However few books prescribed for use in the government curriculum were actually put out by Muslim publishers (in contrast to the good use made in schools of the Muslim newspaper press).

Mail-order, the appointment of agents, and using the structures of the government school system are the more formal channels of distribution. Alongside them were informal channels, which are by definition harder to describe.

It is evident that the considerable number of printed treatises on Islamic law, books on religious history, and books of elementary religious instruction were bound for use in Muslim places of learning. Yet such kitab are not so avidly advertised as syair and hikayat. Kitab titles are seldom mentioned in the notices inserted by publishers in their books advising readers of titles planned or in stock, which are nearly always mostly syair and hikayat. Similarly the entrepreneurial bookseller Haji Muhammad Siraj b. Salih includes relatively few religious books in his extensive newspaper advertising and none at all in his stocklist of 1897-98, despite the fact that he was contemporaneously publishing Malay kitab. This suggests that kitab publication lay somewhat outside the purely commercial domain. One way in which this may be true is evident in the printed texts through occasional statements acknowledging that costs of publication have been defrayed through individual wakaf. Furthermore, most kitab must have been sold not through formal commercial channels but through contacts in the Islamic teaching networks which were central to the experience of traditional learning. The manner in which books circulated along the lines of these networks is not well attested because of the personal nature of the contacts required. An illustration of what might be involved relates to Muhammad b. Abdullah Suhaimi. A scholar and teacher, Suhaimi is known to have published a couple of Arabic treatises in...
INTRODUCTION

Singapore, which he used to promote the Ghazzaliyah tarikat.²²⁹ He was a native of Wonosobo near Yogyakarta in Central Java. After a period in Mecca, he took up residence in Singapore where he became a controversial scholar and took charge of the Kampung Bahru mosque. Meanwhile he kept in touch with disciples promoting his teachings in the Wonosobo district, both by letter and through personal visits. To the leader of these disciples Suhaimi gave a parcel of books to sell. This disciple wrote to Suhaimi in Singapore to pay his respects after Ramadhan in 1902, remitting $25 (about $20) from book sales, and explaining that further books had been sold on credit while others were still unsold.²³⁰ The links between kitab publishing and Islamic educational institutions become more evident late in the period of the survey, with the rise of more formally organised madrasah.²³¹ So some elementary readers and books of religious instruction were published by a foundation in Singapore for subsidised use in madrasah,²³² and upon the opening of the Madrasah al-Iqbal al-Islamiyah in Singapore in 1908, Syaikh Salim b. Awad Basharahil commissioned two kitab at the Al-Imam Press which were probably included in its curriculum.²³³

A recurring feature of the notices placed by publishers in the colophons of their books is the mention of sales in bulk (berkodi-kodi), for which they offered substantial though generally unquantified discounts.²³⁴ When considering who the bulk purchasers of books might be, it is worth recalling that Singapore was the focus from which radiated the informal shipping lines of the archipelago. This was the shipping in native hands, with native craft in large numbers bringing their local produce to Singapore for sale and returning with cloth, manufactures and other consumer luxuries — among them books. We gain a glimpse of the farther extremity of just one of these lines of regular communication in a note by a Dutch administrator and litterateur in the Moluccas:

Every year Makasar prows call in at Banda on their way to the Aru islands, bringing a multitude of articles for the native market. Their arrival is awaited with longing, as the natives hope then to be able to make a selection from a stock of kitab, ceritera and syair. In this way I came into possession of the syair of which a Dutch translation follows [viz. Syair Perang Aceh, which was published in Singapore] ... At the end of another lithographed syair I have found an announcement placed by Haji Muhammad Siradja [sic, = Siraj] in Singapore which informs syair aficionados that these can be obtained from him.²³⁵

No doubt it was through such informal though persistent contacts that many of the books published in Singapore found their way around the coasts of the archipelago.

Such links must have been particularly strong with the pasisir of northern Java, given the family connections of the major Singapore printers and their close involvement with local shipping, for which it will be recalled some were ticket agents.²³⁶ Yet the dynamics of this connection are still little understood. By chance we know that the Leiden University copy of Futuh al-Arifin 1870 had been bought by a Bencoolen man living in Batavia within a year of its publication in Singapore.\textsuperscript{237} We know too that there was an upsurge of Javanese-language publication in Singapore during the 1890s. It was then that Haji Muhammad Siraj published kitab on behalf of clients in Semarang and Surabaya.\textsuperscript{238} Although not all Javanese-language material was necessarily destined for Java, the great increase in such material printed must betoken a response to new opportunities or new demands — indeed this rise in Javanese-language publishing in Singapore prefigured a similar burst of activity in Bombay a decade later.\textsuperscript{239} But little is known of how Singapore books were distributed commercially in Java. We have seen that in the 1890s Haji Muhammad Siraj enrolled Albrecht & Rusche, leading booksellers in Batavia, as agents — though this was probably mainly for handling newspaper subscriptions. Zwemer, though not mentioning Singapore imprints specifically, reports that in about 1920:

In all of the larger cities, Batavia, Weltevreden, Bandoeng, Soerabaya, Samarang, Cheribon, Djokja, Solo, Padang, Palembang, Medan etc., there are Arabic bookshops with a large supply of standard Moslem literature. ... Some of the booksellers publish extensive catalogues. ... Some of this [Naqshbandia and Shathalia] literature we found on sale at railway stations in the hands of book-vendors. ... At small towns, e.g. Blora, we found Indian book-sellers from Bombay carrying on a brisk trade in lithograph Korans and cheap amulets.\textsuperscript{240}

And Drewes recalls:

As recently as the 1920’s and the 1930’s, the only bookshops catering for the indigenous population were run by Arabs, who imported religious literature in Arabic character from Egypt, Bombay, and Singapore.\textsuperscript{241}

\textbf{PRODUCTION}

The activity of the Singapore presses from which these books flowed grew and changed over the survey period. The print industry developed from an embryonic form in the 1860s, in which it essentially undertook a multiplication of the manuscript tradition, to a mature form employing mechanised typographic presses and blessed with new understanding of the book as a literary commodity.

\textit{Experiments, 1860-1880}

During the first two decades, the printing enterprise in Singapore was still in a pioneering phase. Indicative symptoms are that printing had not yet been concentrated in the hands of a few successful commercial printers, and that print still had a close relationship to the manuscript culture it was replacing.

The major Singapore printers of the period were Haji Muhammad Nuh b. Haji Ismail ahf al-Badawi of Juwana (19 items in this period), Haji Muhammad Said b. Haji Muhammad Arsyad of Semarang (12 items), Syaikh Haji Muhammad Ali b. Haji Mustafa of Purbalingga (9 items), Haji Muhammad Salih of Rembang
INTRODUCTION

(7 items), Haji Muhammad Tahir (7 items) and Encik Muhammad Sidin (5 items). This covers about half the number of printers known from the period, and two-thirds of the extant works whose printers are known. These proportions indicate that printing was not concentrated in a few hands. Indeed, publishing activity was spread even more widely than these figures suggest because of the significant number of joint publications during this period. Encik Muhammad Sidin and Haji Muhammad Yahya b. Haji Muhammad Salih, for instance, put out several titles together. Other examples are frequent. The extreme cases are three works jointly put out by a tripartite partnership. Even in those publications put out over the name of a single publisher, there is characteristically a full acknowledgement of those who have contributed to the publication: copyists, owners of the text, owners of the press, printers, sellers. This information was not included to meet any legal requirement. Rather it is indicative of an industry which has not yet been 'shaken out', and which, except for Haji Muhammad Nuh’s contribution, still ran on a rather ad hoc basis. This of course is just what one might expect in the tentative early stage of a pioneer industry, when the potentials of a new technology are being explored but have not been systematically commercialized.

The aim of the printers and scribes who collaborated in early lithographic production was to reproduce the form of the manuscript. This is occasionally evident in the layout of a book which lacks title page or pagination, for instance. Ken Tabuhan 1868 is one early work which straddles the blurred boundary between lithograph and manuscript. In this work, rubrication was added by hand after the text had been printed. Not only did the end result resemble a common manuscript format, but the effect was achieved simply by applying lithographic technique to one stage of the conventional process of scribal copying in which the setting down the of the body text and the subsequent insertion of rubrication were distinct phases. The debt of early lithography to scribal practice is also evident in the prominent mention which early lithographed books give to their copyists. These copyists turned their manuscript skills to preparing the transfer sheets which are reproduced by lithography. It is notable that the two principal copyists of the period were both Trengganu men, namely Husain b. Encik Musa orang Terengganu (10 items in this period) and Yusuf b. Tengku Ibrahim Terengganu (7 items). A reason for favouring writers from Trengganu was the reputation of the Trengganu manuscript hand, as indeed is indicated by a more insistent mention of their place of origin than is the case with other copyists. The next two most frequently acknowledged copyists are, if not from Trengganu, at least from other Malay states. They are Haji Abdul Samad b. Ahmad of Kelantan (4 items) and Tengku Raden Ali b. Tengku Raden Muhammad (also 4 items). None of the copyists is evidently of Javanese extraction, in strong contrast to the printers.

The picture thus emerges of an infant industry in which Javanese are the entrepreneurs, and in which peninsular Malays provide the skilled labour. This is printing in its experimental stage, still very closely linked to the manuscript tradition.

Expansion, 1880-1900

These characteristics of the industry were to change in the following two decades, which may truly be called the heyday of Muslim publishing in Singapore. During the 1880s the amount of printing increases very greatly, as we have seen, and the earlier rather unstructured printing industry gives way to a more concentrated and consistent endeavour. Most activity now falls into the hands of five principal printers, namely Haji Muhammad Said b. Arsyad, Haji Muhammad Siraj b. Salih, his brother Haji Muhammad Sidik b. Salih, Haji Muhammad Amin b. Abdullah, and Haji Muhammad Taib b. Zain. (See the accompanying Table of Multiple Editions.) As a few leading printers become established, the industry becomes somewhat more institutionalised. Printing is now less frequently credited to ad hoc alliances of individuals, and more frequently takes place under business names, such as Matbaah Haji Muhammad Amin. Reflecting both this institutionalisation and a second-generation Singapore population, printers are now less likely to identify themselves with ethnic or geographical epithets. At the same time the typical product of the Singapore printers is becoming less like a manuscript. Cheap paper, of Indian or more probably Japanese origin, is substituted for the good quality European paper used in many early lithographs; books are sold ready bound, again unlike many earlier lithographs; and less care is taken with the calligraphy, though more expertise is evident in laying out the printed sheets.

The salient features of the Muslim printing of this period can be exemplified by focussing on three active individuals.

Haji Muhammad Said b. Haji Muhammad Arsyad Rembang operated from two shops, one three doors down from the gate of Sultan Mosque, at 51 Sultan Road, the another a further four doors down at 47. He was far and away the most prolific publisher during this heyday of Singapore Muslim printing. The long list of titles under his name in the accompanying Table of Multiple Editions is indicative.

Said began publishing in 1870, and continued through a long and active lifetime as Singapore’s most successful commercial printer. His surviving output from the 1870s is not extensive, but during the 1880s he became a consistent and prolific publisher. As the Table of Multiple Editions suggests he concentrated upon popular syair and hikayat. He seems to have been less concerned with kitab printing than his competitors. This made him the most determinedly commercial of all Singapore printers. Said was first and foremost a press operator. He probably did not himself transcribe any of the books he printed. Early in the 1880s he employed the Trengganu copyist Hasan b. Ishak, and later Encik Ibrahim (whose work will be discussed below), Muhammad of Riau, and Burhan.
However, while he may have engaged copyists to prepare his books, Said does seem to have done nearly all his own printing. 257

As Said’s business prospered and the demand for his popular brand of printing expanded, he made an opening in the other major regional market by setting up a branch office in Penang in 1892. The running of this outlet was soon taken over by his son Majtahid and developed into a thriving bookshop, selling to the northern peninsular and Sumatran markets. 258 This was the first step in transmuting Said’s personal achievement into a family enterprise.

Haji Muhammad Siraj b. Haji Muhammad Salih Rembang was the son of another of Singapore’s early Javanese printing families. His father Haji Muhammad Salih was a minor printer in the 1870s, as was one of Siraj’s brothers, Yahya. Siraj made a somewhat later start but went on to become the second most prolific of the Singapore printers. His shop and printing premises were located at 43 Sultan Road, a few doors down from Said’s shop. As he tells us at the end of a syair he published:

\begin{align*}
&\text{Haji Muhammad Siraj namanya diri} \\
&\text{di Kampung Gelam Singapura negeri} \\
&\text{mengecap syair demikian peri} \\
&\text{inilah kerja sehari-hari.} 259 \end{align*}

In 1891, his successful business employed a staff of ten. 260

His output was only half that of Said, but he eclipses Said in other fields, for Siraj was the great retailer of printed books and the most promiscuous entrepreneur. During the years 1889-1891, Siraj was acting editor of the newspaper Jawi Peranakan and used the opportunity to advertise his bookshop’s wares at length and with maximum prominence. For weeks on end the whole front page of the newspaper was taken up by Siraj’s advertisement. Like other publishers, he also made broadsheet catalogues available free on request. The purpose of the advertisements and catalogues was not just to attract customers to the shop, but also to instigate orders either through the small network of agents which Siraj had developed, or through the mail. 261 Siraj’s stock list of 1897-98 shows that he sold a variety of publications, ranging from government school books to Netherlands Indies books in Roman script, to Cairo newspapers, but above all the syair and hikayat issued by the publishers of Kampung Gelam. The local stock he held for sale was not at all confined to his own products; in fact Said’s books predominate while Siraj’s own publications are relatively few. Indeed, the Said family directed mail orders for their publications to Siraj. 262

Siraj’s forte was the organisation of collaborative enterprises. Perhaps only one third of the extant publications bearing his name are unambiguously his own sole productions. In the majority of cases he was a collaborator, sometimes with copyists, more often with printers. Siraj made occasional use of the working Singapore copyists, Ibrahim, 263 Muhammad Hasan b. Haji Muhammad Jin, 264 and Burhan; 265 but unlike Said, Siraj was a copyist-editor in his own right. Indeed he is explicitly acknowledged as the copyist of a number of works printed on others’ presses, including several major kitab in Javanese pegon. More significant were his collaborations with other printers. Not surprisingly he worked most closely with his brother Sidik. In fact Sidik began work from Siraj’s premises. He went on in 1891 to open a shop next door to Siraj at 42 Sultan Road and began running his own press to which he gave a florid Arabic title. Siraj’s brother became a second-echelon Muslim printer in his own right, as the Table of Multiple Editions shows. The works which Siraj published on Sidik’s press were in the main bulky Javanese kitab. His other most frequent collaborator was a near-namesake, Haji Muhammad Siraj b. Haji Yahya, commonly known as Haji Siraj al-Jawa, who printed 11 works for Siraj during 1900-1902 over in Palembang Road. Others with whom Siraj collaborated were (in chronological order) Termidi, Said, Uthman, Taib and Amin. At one time his relation with Taib seems to have been particularly close, as an advertisement for his bookshop was issued over both his own name and that of Taib.

Siraj was also able to cast his net wider than this cluster of lithographic publishers in Kampung Gelam. If clients desired letterpress printing, he could arrange that. For the Dar al-Adab Club he contracted with the American Mission Press to print a set of football rules combining letterpress text and lithographed diagrams. To supply the school market, he used the Jawi Peranakan-owned Denodaya Press, under Makhdum Sahib, to print a typeset jawi version of the Hikayat Sultan Ibrahim, which was used as a school reader. Like Said, Siraj arranged an outlet in Penang. He did so not by seconding a family member there, but through his favoured strategy of collaboration. In 1887 he forged links with the major Penang publisher and bookseller Haji Putih b. Syaikh Abu Basyir. Siraj printed books on behalf of Putih, put out parallel editions for himself and Putih, and used Putih as an agent for his bookselling business. He also undertook printing commissions from Malacca. In another direction, in 1889, Siraj marketed a few of his books in Batavia through Albrecht & Rusche. Indeed his contacts reached further into the archipelago, as he arranged the publication of religious works for clients in Semarang, Macassar, Palembang, and Pariaman.

Unlike Said or Siraj, Encik Ibrahim Riau was not a very significant printer in his own right. He is interesting for other contributions to publishing. His shop lay just beyond the circle of greatest publishing activity in Sultan Road, at 720 North Bridge Road, across from the Istana between Jalan Kubur and Jalan Kledek. The other second-tier printers similarly worked from premises just beyond the Sultan Road precinct. Haji Muhammad Taib’s shop was a few blocks south-west at 31 Kampung Bali Lane, while Haji Muhammad Amin worked from various shops in Bali Lane and then nearer the Sultan Road area at 6 and 7 Baghdad Street.

Ibrahim’s name is linked to 95 editions, of which all but 19 are syair. Ibrahim may have worked as a copyist of manuscripts in Riau before moving to Singapore. If so, he continued this trade in Singapore, copying now for litho-graphic printers. On the available evidence, he began his Singapore career in 1881 by copying two syair for lithography at the press of Haji Termidi. During a brief period 1885 to 1888, Ibrahim operated as a publisher in his own right, printing some 14 editions on his own press. However, toward the end of this short period he took on lithographic copying for Said, Siraj and Taib; and from 1889 onward, Ibrahim no longer printed and published independently. Rather, over the next twenty years, Ibrahim became the leading lithographic copyist in Singapore, working with most of the active lithographic printers of the day. Ibrahim, it seems, assumed the role described by Hurgronje when he reported that Singapore printers generally retained 'a destitute haji or some other person with a good writing hand' in their service, and had them copy out for lithographic transfer, works of which the printer had a copy and for which he knew there was demand. The loss of Ibrahim's skills upon his death was remembered by Singapore publishers as a considerable setback to their industry.

Ibrahim's work with Said was considerable, beginning in 1886 and continuing until he ceased to be active about 1910. He is identified as the copyist of 44 of Said's lithographed editions. In reality he will have worked on more than this, for he sometimes failed to put his name to lithograph editions which we know were his because he is recorded as author/editor in the copyright registration. With Siraj, he did much less, being known to have written up only 7 editions between 1886 and 1901 — recall that Siraj was himself a lithographic copyist, and undoubtedly worked up most of his own material. With other, less prolific printers, Ibrahim did proportionally more work: 12 editions with Taib over six years, 10 editions with Sidik over three years, though only 3 with Amin in a connection which lasted only two years. Ibrahim's involvements from time to time with most of the major publishers confirms the pattern of close collaborative relationships also evident with Siraj's activities.

In fact the extant evidence simply will not let us untangle the web of transactions which lay behind the production of these books. There are sometimes colourful imprecations directed against those who would pirate printed books or even copy them by hand — manuscripts were still being copied, sometimes from printed books — but there is rarely a sense of working copyright. The Table of Multiple Editions above shows the same titles recurring in several printers' lists. Many of these books were cheap syair already in the public domain, in which proprietary rights were of no great moment. Even with more substantial works, new books were recopied from old; editions were jointly produced; and sometimes a single imprint might be issued as two editions. The only recorded formal transaction involving the transfer by sale of intellectual property concerned Miskin Marakarmah, a rare case in which a local Muslim publisher was printing for the Government school market and therefore had more regard for the Western conception of copyright. Closer to the norm was collaboration of the kind found in the 1888 editions of Panji Semirang. Two editions of this text appeared within days; a third just less than a year later. The list of persons implicated runs the gamut of major active figures: Haji Muhammad (a minor printer), Ibrahim Riau, Haji Muhammad Said, Haji Muhammad Tahir, Haji Muhammad Siraj and Haji Muhammad Sidik. However the producers of such books generally felt no need to publish details of those who had contributed to the various processes of production.

So, despite the concentration of printing among a small number of publishing houses in the decades 1880-1900, Muslim book publishing remained an informally organised cottage industry, conducted in the main by men living and working in close proximity, many from strikingly similar backgrounds, some of whom were kinsmen. They were colleagues as well as competitors.

Displacements, 1900-1920

The third phase of Malay Muslim printing in Singapore is one of decline and reorientation. This period sees the marginalisation of the cottage industry which had been so productive in the last decades of the nineteenth century. The nature of the changes is partly revealed through the continuing history of the Said family enterprise. In the new century the leading role passed to Said’s sons. As we have seen, a branch office in Penang had been put in the charge of Majtahid by 1898. Meanwhile in Singapore the family shop moved to 82 Arab Street (about 1908) and operations largely fell upon the shoulders of the remaining sons: principally Abdullah, with Muhammad, Khalid and Hamzah taking subsidiary roles. Moreover the nature of those operations was changing. Whereas their father had been above all a printer, both Majtahid and Abdullah became increasingly occupied with retailing books rather than with producing them. Even when they did publish, their books were much more likely to have been printed outside the family, their role becoming that of coordinating the various phases of the production and marketing of the book. As Siraj was not very active after 1901, Abdullah effectively assumed Siraj’s mantle as a bookseller, though not as a printer. As Siraj had done, so now Abdullah issued free price-lists to interested inquirers. One is known to be extant. It was not printed by Abdullah: he contracted its typographic printing to Matbaah al-Ahmadiah. The Said family’s shift out of manufacture into retailing reflects deep changes in a maturing industry.

Around the turn of the century, the position of Singapore book printers was greatly weakened as the markets of Singapore and its hinterland were invaded by imported books printed in Bombay and Mecca. This was not altogether a new phenomenon. As we noted earlier, the earliest Malay-language publishing in other Muslim lands probably took place in Bombay and possibly Cairo in 1876 and 1880. By 1886 tarikat handbooks printed in Javanese pegon in Cairo were circulating in Java along with their Arabic-language counterparts. The Malay books printed in Mecca from 1884 had reached Singapore by 1887. Singapore’s most active bookseller, Haji Muhammad Siraj, then signalled his entry into the retailing of Middle East imprints when he announced that he had just received a shipment of the first Malay-language books printed in Mecca: "... kitab printed in Mecca in the Malay language comprising various titles written by Syaikh Daud Patani and Syaikh Arsyad Banjar which have been issued within the last two years." In the same year Siraj issued a flurry of notices that he had for sale books in the Arabic and Javanese languages as well as in Malay, explaining further that these included Meccan, Istambul and Singapore imprints. In 1894, Snouck Hurgronje commented that ... it must not be forgotten that over the last decade the Malays have made brisk use of typographic and lithographic presses in Istambul, Cairo, Mecca and Bombay, and that countless Malay books printed in those places have gained a far wider distribution in the archipelago than the generally pitifully poor Singapore imprints (with due regard for honourable exceptions like Si Miskin). Just the other day, for instance, I received a chest full of new Malay imprints from the abovementioned places; and in the case of Mecca, they are regularly imported here [to Batavia].

It is also from 1894 that we have the first evidence of direct links between Singapore and the prolific presses of Bombay. An edition of Hidayat al-Salikin lithographed in that year in Bombay included in its colophon a notice that it was available for purchase from Muhammad Siddik, 182 Arab Street, Singapore. The availability of books from Mecca and beyond led to new demands being placed on Singapore publishers. One response was the reprinting in Singapore of books which had first been printed elsewhere. But the continuing challenge to the Singapore printers was, as Hurgronje implied, the greatly superior quality of the imported books.

Soon after the turn of the century the full impact of this invasion becomes evident in the Singapore trade. It was then that direct links opened between Singapore publishers and booksellers and Bombay printers. The first instance of such a connection dates from 1905 when, working from his office at 15 Arab Street, Singapore, Ismail b. Syaikh Badal began printing Javanese and Sundanese kitab using presses in both Singapore and Bombay concurrently. Another Bombay printer and publisher, Alibhai Sharafali, had printed titles for a Semarang publisher in 1899, and went on to publish Malay language titles on his own behalf, eventually setting up an office in Singapore at 75 Arab Street some time before 1921. For some time thereafter he published from Singapore while continuing to print in Bombay.

By the second decade of the twentieth century books from Cairo and Bombay were flooding into Southeast Asia. The internationalisation of the Malay book trade is fully evident in 1912 when Haji Muhammad Said's sons advertised that they stocked books printed in Mecca, Istambul, Russia, Egypt and Bombay. Of course not all these books were in Malay, or Javanese, but a great many were, and by this time the number of copies of Malay books printed in Bombay alone had far outstripped the local Singapore production. Among the titles printed in India and the Middle East, kitab are particularly well represented. The impact on local printing was such that, from a peak about 1900, kitab publishing in Singapore swiftly fell back to the level of the 1870s, i.e. to about half the peak rate. Moreover, as imprints from Mecca, Cairo, Istambul, and Bombay were of superior quality, or emanated from the high places of Islam, they were held in greater esteem than the local products. This is evident from the terms in which they were advertised.

The close of this survey sees the Singapore booksellers still operating their own lithographic presses, but with declining vigour. Overbeck, who, alone of contemporary scholars, took an interest in the popular Muslim press, records that the industry had fallen into a parlous state by the 1920s. New books were not being published, and booksellers were pessimistic about demand for their product. They informed Overbeck that lithographic book production had become a dead art. The cottage industry was dying. But high quality lithographic publishing continued to thrive. By 1926 two major publishers new to Singapore had put out competing editions of Syair Siti Zubaidah, formerly a mainstay of the cottage lithographers. The new publishers were Sulaiman Mari'e, formerly based in Surabaya, who did his printing in Egypt, and Alibhai Sharafali, printing in Bombay. Both had the capacity to supply fine lithographs of the type familiar in Malaysia and Singapore in recent times. Their offshore printing was an immense technical advance over the old Singapore lithographs.

Contemporaneous with the internationalisation of the book market was another technological development with far-reaching effects for local Muslim printing. That was the adoption of typography. There had been typographic publications by Muslim publishers throughout the period of this study but they were rare until the 1890s. Early commercial printing had been almost wholly lithographic. As already mentioned, lithography provided an easy transition from the techniques of manuscript copying to printing, and reproduced a familiar graphic form. For kitab in particular, lithography conveniently reproduced interlinear glosses, dependent commentary and the like, using customary devices of text layout and script size to express hierarchies of textual authority. Lithography is so redolent of the prestigious old manuscript tradition that copies of the Quran are almost invariably printed by lithography or similar techniques to this day. But during the 1890s, attitudes began to change. While typeset jawi was still locally the preserve of the newspaper press and the school-room, typeset kitab began to arrive in numbers from Mecca. Earlier prejudices that typography was an impious Christian artefact began to dissipate. From about the turn of the century a small but increasing proportion of Singapore Malay books were printed using the letterpress rather than lithography. Apparently, the advantages offered by typography were becoming more widely appreciated, so that by 1915 lithographic printers were feeling the pinch: Haji Muhammad Said had Miskin Marakarmah 1915 printed typographically at the Methodist Mission Press, explaining that while previously the work had always been lithographed, this edition had been produced in clearer and neater typeset print in response to persistent inquiries from purchasers. In the twenty years 1880-1900 one tenth of Muslim-published editions were typeset; for 1900-1920 the proportion rose to one quarter.

The technology of typography had implications for the organization of the industry. The economics of typography and lithography differ significantly. With typography, high overheads resulting from capital costs of equipment and the employment of skilled staff make idle time expensive. Not until the first newspaper was launched was there sufficient regular work to justify a letterpress. Even for the proprietors of this newspaper, Jawi Peranakan, operating overheads, including the need to renew costly type fonts, was crippling. This limitation was critical in view of the small market for Muslim books: compared with the circulation of manuscripts, the output of the early printing presses may have been enormous, but it was not enough to keep even one press fully occupied, much less the several which produced lithographic printing. The shift into typography therefore implies a change of scale which takes printing beyond a cottage industry on the small plan of the lithographers. The new typographic presses were government run (and therefore immune from capital constraints), or associated with the production of newspapers or magazines (in which rapid mass production may cover overheads). Their status as formal business enterprises, rather than personally-conducted cottage industries, is symptomatically revealed in the names of the new presses, which are invariably impersonal: Matbaah al-Ikhwan, Matbaah al-Usrah, etc. Further, the new capital-intensive technology induced functional specialization. Press operators were no longer major book retailers.

The publishers who had led in lithography did not altogether spurn the new technology, but the occasions on which they used it were rare. Said, Amin, and Idris published a mere handful of typeset books. On the other hand there was no reluctance by the new presses to rely on the old lithographers, who were the largest established retailers, as wholesale and retail agents. We find Siraj specified as an agent for the sale of publications by the Johor and Riau government presses and the Denodaya Press run by the Jawi Peranakan, Makhdum Sahib b. Ghulam Muhayiddin Sahib.

The changes of technology, organisation, and a broadening conception of the market during this period are perhaps encapsulated in the example of the Matbaah al-Imam. Matbaah al-Imam was a typographic press which operated, as a firm, with support from the Riau government. It situated itself in the international market a little vaingloriously, as 'the biggest Muslim press in Southeast Asia'.
Beyond Singapore, Muslim publishing began later and was less prolific. As more diffuse regional communications and the economic development of the hinterland reduced the primacy of Singapore as the central node of peninsular communications networks, Penang emerged as a subsidiary centre. Penang had as its hinterland the western Malay states and the east coast of Sumatra, which prospered as tin mines and plantations were opened up at the turn of the century. Among books published in Penang before 1920 were one commissioned from Perak and another from west Sumatra. 325

Muslim printing in Penang is less well attested than in Singapore. Even so it certainly never approached the same quantity. Only one work is known to have been printed before the 1880s, on a still unidentified press. 326 It was not until the 1890s that local printing was well under way, only to decline sharply again in the 1910s. Even at its peak during 1880-1910, Penang's output is quite low. For this period, the number of editions is only 32, one-twentieth the number published by Muslim printers in Singapore in the same period. The number of active publishers is correspondingly small. Indeed fully half of these 32 editions were published or co-published by one leading Penang bookseller, Haji Putih b. Syaikh Abu Basyir, a Jawi Pekan of north Indian extraction.

We have earlier seen that during the high tide of Penang publishing, the two major publishers of Singapore established retail outlets in Penang: Said by opening a branch of the family shop about 1892, which was later run by his son Majtahid; and Siraj by entering a loose arrangement with Haji Putih. Like their Singapore counterparts, Putih and Majtahid operated from premises near the Malay Mosque, in the adjacent Acheen and Armenian Streets. While Majtahid confined his activities mainly to bookselling, 327 Putih was a great innovator who contributed in several capacities: as translator, editor, and publisher, as well as retailer. Putih made two prose translations from Hindi (Ganja Mara 1886, 1897; Bustamam 1895, 1900) which he had lithographed at three Penang printeries, the Muhammadiah Press, Freeman Press, and Kim Seck Hean Press. In addition, he published another popular Hindi theatrical piece in Malay verse (Indera Sebaha 1889, 1896), issued jointly with Siraj and printed in Singapore. Haji Putih also commissioned new editions of other titles already available in Singapore from Siraj. 328

Despite the close connections of Majtahid and Putih with Singapore, the organisation of Penang publishing and printing differed from that prevailing in contemporary Singapore. In Penang there was a sharp transition from nineteenth century lithography to twentieth century typography. With the exception of a couple of works printed by the Penang and Straits Printing Co., all nineteenth century Muslim publishing was lithographed, including newspapers. 329 In 1900 the Criterion Press brought out the first newspaper in typeset jawi. 330 Thereafter only typeset books are known to have been published for the remainder of the survey period. The rapidity and completeness of this change result from the absence of vertically-integrated printer-booksellers in Penang. Unlike Singapore, where the lithographers carried on after typography had become a feasible alternative, in Penang the functions of publishing and printing had always been separate. One lithographic press, the Muhammadiah Press (later Freeman Press) was in Muslim hands, but it neither published nor retailed books in its own right. In fact, most of Penang’s Muslim books were printed on Chinese-run presses. The Kim Seck Hean Press put out a lithographed jawi newspaper, produced fine lithographed texts for Wilkinson to use in schools, and reprinted a title for the Penang bookseller Haji Putih which had earlier been printed at the Freeman Press. When jawi typography became accessible, publishers had no vested interest in the old technology: their choice was between one Chinese-owned lithographic press and another Chinese-owned letterpress which could do the job as well and almost as cheaply.

The lack of vertical integration in early Penang publishing also explains why its publications bear some of the same characteristics as their Singapore counterparts of twenty-five years previously. Akidat aZ-Munajjin 1893, for instance, is depicted as a collaborative effort involving separate credits to all who contributed: printer, commissioner, censor, typesetter, and owner of the text. As with the early Singapore kitab publications, it was apparently conceived as an ad hoc collaborative work of high moral value. Also like the early phase of Singapore Muslim publishing, Penang publishing concentrated on the printing of religious manuals and tracts. Most of the works which did not emanate from Haji Putih fall into this category, amounting to about half of all Penang publications for the period.

As literacy spread and communications became more diffuse in the twentieth century, a multiplicity of smaller centres of publication emerged in the peninsular Malay States. The Penang model was replicated again and again on a smaller scale. The early concentration on books of religious teaching was repeated. Similarly too, the functions of publishing and printing were separate, with printing often undertaken at Chinese-owned printeries. The single important exception to this arrangement was the quasi-governmental press of the Majlis Ugama Islam dan Adat Istiadat Kelantan.

The situation in Penang and on the Peninsula confirms the peculiarity of Singapore, which alone had a sufficiently large market for Muslim books early enough to give the opportunity for Javanese entrepreneurs to establish a few viable Muslim printing houses while appropriate technology was still simple and affordable, and before competition from general commercial printeries and large overseas printers made such a venture foolhardy.

THE PRINT THRESHOLD

The immensity of the increase in the raw materials of literacy during the nineteenth century is hard to comprehend. In the early nineteenth century manuscripts were expensive and hard to come by; by the end of the century, books were cheap and actively marketed. Print allowed an explosion in the amount of available written material. Estimates of the number of literary Malay manuscripts extant in identified collections range around 4,000 to 5,000; it has been further speculated that all told, including manuscripts in private hands, there may be 10,000 Malay literary manuscripts extant. Even if these figures are considerably awry, it hardly matters when we put them beside the output of the press. In 1890, the first year for which we have orderly data for output of printed works, one Muslim printer registered ten titles for copyright. In all, these ten registered titles accounted for 10,000 printed books. In other words, the number of books produced by one Singapore printer in one year equalled the estimated number of all the surviving literary manuscripts copied over four centuries. And this is for the registered titles of but one printer; it takes no account of the registered titles of other printers, nor of the fifty or so titles known to have been published by Muslim

This chart plots trends in the annual publishing output of books and newspapers in Malay measured in millions of pages. printers that year but not registered. Including these titles, we are looking at the production of over 50,000 books for the year. In other words, during 1890, the estimated number of surviving literary manuscripts was equalled in book production by Singapore printers every two weeks. And this still ignores all Malay books printed elsewhere; — and ignores newspapers.

This sudden and immense acceleration of the production of literary material cannot be correlated in any reasonable way with an increase in literacy. The history of literacy in the region in the nineteenth century is largely undocumented. Conditions of increasing urbanisation, new commercial opportunities, and the deeper penetration of the cash economy into the urban hinterland during the latter part of the nineteenth were all congenial to the advance of literacy. Yet even in the early decades of the twentieth century the effects of government-sponsored schooling in literacy were only beginning to be felt, and still tended to be an urban phenomenon. In his study on The Origins of Malay Nationalism, Roff asserts that the nineteenth century audience for newspapers was "the small elite group of literate Jawi Peranakan, Arabs, and Malays in the towns and some of the Malay-speaking Straits Chinese." Although the audience must have been wider for printed books, which were a cheaper and less radically innovative medium, Roff’s assessment cannot be far off the mark.

Given that the great upsurge in commercial book production during the 1880s and 1890s was not accompanied by a commensurate rise in literacy rates, then other factors were also in play. Part of the likely explanation for the phenomenon is that even at the low levels of literacy obtaining in the nineteenth century, there was an unfulfilled capacity for the consumption of literary material. This unfulfilled capacity stemmed in part from the costliness of books produced by manuscript copying. Printing reduced the cost of physical reproduction to about one-tenth of what it had been. But no less important than cost was access. Manuscript literature was not in an established market, and, being relatively scarce, manuscripts were not easy to locate. Abdullah bin Abdul Kadir’s description of his encounter with manuscripts in Kelantan in the 1830s is indicative:

I met Inche Ha, the Raja Bendahara’s man, and asked him to try to get the Story of Gemala Bahrain for me. He said that he had a bundle of Malay manuscripts put away, belonging to a relative; he would see what was in the bundle and bring it to me, so that I could choose. I offered to go to his house to inspect the manuscripts, as I was in a hurry to sail, but he said there was no need; he would bring them to me. Then he went home, and later came with a basket wrapped in cloth. I opened it and found manuscripts on the subject of religion and prayer. And there were two chapters of the Story of Isma Dewa Pekerma Raja, very well composed; ... And there was one book called Khoja Maimun. I borrowed the books from Inche Ha; I asked him to let me take them to Singapore for copying, after which I would return them with a suitable present. Meanwhile I gave him a fine handkerchief of Indian cotton, worth 4 rupees. He was delighted and told me that after copying what I wanted I could send the manuscripts back by Inche Buntal. 339

Several points are instructive here. Abdullah failed to find the particular text he had in mind; indeed his expectations do not seem to have been very high. This is not very surprising given that his strategy to locate the text had to rely on the very limited social connections at his disposal, specifically his acquaintance with one of the Raja Bendahara's henchman who had earlier been assigned to protect their party. Further, Abdullah's eagerness to copy odds and ends from the basket of old manuscripts to which he did gain access there in distant Kelantan says much about the general availability of texts in the environs of Singapore. 340 The arrangements for the procurement, borrowing and return of these miscellaneous manuscripts were negotiated ad hoc and further relied on a series of personal relationships: the Raja Bendahara under whose protection Abdullah's party visited Kelantan, his henchman Encik Ha, Encik Ha's relative who owned the manuscripts, and another acquaintance Encik Buntal who would return them. Manuscript reproduction is shown by this example to be time-consuming not simply because each copy had to be made by a separate process of scribal copying, but also because procurement of the text could also prove taxing. Printed books, by contrast, were market commodities, stocked and promoted for sale. Once printed and sold, copies circulated in relative abundance. A visit to a bookshop, or to a market stall, or an order from a publisher's catalogue offered a much greater chance of success in obtaining a desired title, and a much more straightforward way of obtaining a wide range of reading material. Manuscripts were later sold incidentally by booksellers, 341 but the very existence of the bookshop (and indeed the notion of a market in books) was a by-product of the copious and continuous supply of material which printing provided. Printing thus had the twin effects of substantially reducing the price of written material and simultaneously removing impediments of access. The results demonstrated how dramatically elastic the demand for literary material was.

The upsurge in consumption of literary material is thus an aspect of the transformation of text into commodity. Traditionally access to manuscript material had been governed by cultivated social relations, not the promiscuous transactions of the market-place. Manuscripts of religious texts were copied in the pondok-pesantren under a teacher's eye, and duly authorised. 342 Access to other manuscript texts had been guarded for reasons of prestige by courtiers 343 or for reasons of livelihood by professional reciters. 344 Even owners of manuscripts of recreational literature which brought no remuneration or social cachet might be reluctant to lend. 345 Furthermore literary transactions, being conceived as social in nature, were not properly conducted as commercial transactions. The owner of a borrowed manuscript would not expect to be repaid in money. 346 As we just saw, Abdullah b. Abdul Kadir recompensed the owner of the manuscripts he borrowed with a gift, not in money. And when the copying was done, he planned to return the manuscripts with a further gift. But while Abdullah accepted the convention that a social transaction was involved here, and a gift was the fitting way to return the favour granted by the owner of a manuscript, in his own mind he tended to translate the dealings into commercial terms (as he did with much else), quantifying the cash value of the gift. The reluctance of some manuscript owners to lend stems from the same conflict of values. On the one hand recognising the compelling force of social obligation to lend, they feared that their valuable property would be damaged or simply not returned. Only if the manuscript was lost, could they legitimately claim monetary compensation. The deeper intrusion of the commercial values of the urban market-place into manuscript transactions is evident in the commercial manuscript lending libraries of the early nineteenth century, with set fees calculated by the night. Printing ultimately undid these social bonds. It undermined the professional reciter's livelihood, and the ruling house's monopoly, and began to release the private owner of a text from entanglement in fraught social relations. As publishers of the new printed syair asked, why risk ill-feeling by lending or borrowing when a syair can be bought for a few cents?

With the advent of commercial printing, the flood of available printed matter began to sweep literature from its social moorings. If hitherto the scarcity of written literature and the conditions of its manuscript transmission had embedded texts in social relationships, the new technology of multiple reproduction released these ties by placing copies of the text in the market-place and the school-house. It was futile to struggle against this intrinsic quality of the new technology. Once a text had been reproduced in several hundred copies, or even one hundred copies, its erstwhile custodians could no longer feasibly regulate access to it. The ambivalence of the custodians of tradition to the new technology is nicely captured in a Riau court publication, Perjalanan Sultan Lingga 1894. This journal of royal peregrinations, including photographs of the royal party, was committed to print to achieve maximum publicity:

di dalam matbaah dimasukkan dia
supaya berhamburan seluruh dunia

Yet the Riau court also vainly attempted to keep control of the text by forbidding its reproduction on any other press, averring that to do so would be a sin and lèse-majesté (dosa ... derhaka). The reality was that once in print a text was readily accessible to any individual who had a small cash sum. Books were advertised and sold alongside patent medicines and bolts of cloth. Texts of the devotional exercises of the religious brotherhoods were published as pamphlets. Histories of Malay ruling houses, Hikayat Marong Mahawangsa, Sejarah Melayu, and Misa Melayu were put into the hands of common schoolboys by Christian missionaries and the colonial Education Department. Klinkert observed how the Sejarah Melayu, which had formerly been kept in the Riau palace wrapped in golden silk and read on ceremonial occasions to the accompaniment of cannon salutes, had been transformed by print into a school text used in the government Malay schools.
INTRODUCTION

in nearby Singapore. The Tuhfat al-Nafis was saved from this fate, for its text was still within the control of the Riau ruling house, and remained in manuscript. But, dramatic as this transformation of politically-potent texts was, its impact was more than matched by an effect which was more subtle. That was simply that print brought popular recreational texts more often before the eyes of listeners. These deep-seated changes were tantamount to the creation of a new literature by the printing press.

This new literature was brought into being not only by transforming old texts; new texts were also created especially for print. The diversity of literary material available was enhanced by the printing of Baba and Mission material, both unknown before the advent of print, and by translations from Hindi, English, and Arabic. The translation of literary and religious works into Malay has a venerable history, but its pace now accelerated and the results were given more immediate and wider distribution. Due to differences in dialect, script and interest, not all varieties of literary material reached all Malay-reading audiences — in this regard literature contrasts strongly with the developing commercial theatre which spanned linguistic and cultural barriers much more effectively. But the mere consciousness that print-literature was so diverse was itself significant, for it further detached the generalised phenomenon of printed literature from particular social contexts of the kind which inevitably envelop a manuscript or performance of a text.

(Once texts had become commodities, removed from the particularities of their social context, it became possible for the first time to think of literature as an abstract category comparable to our modern understanding of the term. The first implicit statement of the new concept was the bookseller's catalogue. Explicit statements, in the guise of literary criticism and literary history, would follow much later. A term for this new concept would be invented when, in Sweeney's words, "the term 'sastra' was semantically 'refilled' to accommodate the Western concept of 'Literature'."

THE NEW READING

Needless to say, this technologically-induced transformation of literature was an uneven process. It applied in a society marked by very uneven distribution of literate skills, and operated through several means of reproduction in print. Indeed an interesting insight into the progress of change can be gained by comparing the application of the two print technologies of lithography and typography. We have noted that lithography was at first favoured by commercial printers for its continuities with manuscript reproduction, both in graphic form and as an industrial process. Typography on the other hand was associated with innovation in communications media, particularly in the form of the newspaper, and with a greater leap into commodity manufacturing. It had the smack of modernity about it. In a revealing foreword to his polite letter-writer Pelita Menyurat 1913, Muhammad b. Muhammad Ali Sambas remarks that he decided against lithography and in favour of typography for his book because Muslims deserved the best, and in this modern age typography was more in tune with the new ways of thinking. It is no surprise, then, to find that innovation in literary forms should be better represented in the repertoire and style of typographically-printed books.

Typographic works characteristically had contemporary reference and were authored by contemporary writers. In the period of this survey, the repertoire of Muslim typographic presses was dominated by two classes of texts which figure less prominently in the lithographer's lists. One class comprises moral admonition; the other comprises reportage and semi-contemporary history. The former, works of moral admonition, have a contemporary reference in being at least implicitly addressed to current religious neglect. It is in the second class, of reportage and semi-contemporary history, that the contemporary orientation of typography is most evident. Historical subjects were also important to the lithographed tradition, but they are history of a particular kind. Lithographed histories are the traditional histories of early Islam like the great story of Muhammad Hanafi, and are set either in the historical-cum-legendary Middle East of early Islam, or are adventure romances like Abdul Muluk unanchored in time and loosely located in place. In lithography, locally situated histories were almost wholly ignored and recent events given scant coverage. Typography, by contrast, thrives on the recent history of local events (e.g. Pangeran Kahar 1887, Johor 1911) or world events (e.g. Napoleon I 1888, Matahari Memancar 1906). Maier noticed these two kinds of history when he dealt with the contrast between the old story of Kedah, Marong Mahawangsa 1898, which remained close to the manuscript tradition and conveyed a legendary antiquity, and Salasilah Kedah 1911, which offered a consciously new history of Kedah "with dates and with many a story about British Glory." Marong Mahawangsa 1898 was lithographed (though not by a Muslim publisher: its local subject matter did not interest any commercial lithographer, but rather a European school inspector). The new Salasilah Kedah 1911 was printed typographically. In general the move from lithography to typography signals a marked transformation of consciousness: a shift towards a far more specific sense of time and place. Further, this shift in outlook can be related to another use of typographic print. Both the leading classes of new typographic literature — the moral admonitions and the narratives of recent history — show an affinity with the periodical press in its functions as a mirror of the times, commentator on contemporary mores, and a reporter of the passage of contemporary events.

Another principal mark of the new literature is that the author began to achieve prominence as a named individual. This was to some extent simply a by-product of the number of moralising works in the typographic repertoire.
Traditionally the author's name had been highlighted only in the case of kitab, for the reason that the authority of a kitab text rests upon the standing of the teacher. (The sense that a book of religious teaching must be attributed to authoritative figures is ironically evident from the apologetic nature of the attribution in Masail al-Muhtadi: "written by scholars of yore whose names have not been passed down". Contemporary popular works of moral exhortation relied no less upon the author's authority to establish their credibility. But this does not explain the author's prominence in other genres. There, identification of the author seems to be a way of signalling the novelty of a recent creation. This is no doubt one reason why translator's names are featured in the book versions of the latest Hindi stage-shows. Identifying authorship also becomes a way of locating the register of the work in the widening landscape of printed literature. Yet this still falls short of a full explanation. Again it is the histories which furnish the clearest evidence of a change in attitude toward authorship. All but one of the works of history and semi-contemporary reportage published in typography were by named contemporary authors, while all but two of the comparable lithographed works were anonymous. In fact the association of typography and named authors was so strong that the only significant group of typographic texts which were anonymous was government publications. (Government publications, though, convey an explicit institutional authority which substitutes for personal authorship.) The presence of the author could be established by various means: an indication of the author's name on the title page, or inclusion of a signed author's preface, or more elaborate devices. The most recent Islamic work included in this survey, Siraj al-Anam 1921, forcefully established its translator's presence by opening with his portrait photograph. An equally elaborate expression of the author's authoritative contemporary presence is found in the Salasilah Kedah 1911, in which the author not only named himself on the title page in such a way as to establish his credentials as a Kedah courtier, but further indicated the number of the page within the book upon which he appeared as a participant in the events described.

Interestingly, both the ways in which the author of Salasilah Kedah 1911 promoted himself assume individual reading: a title page with its hierarchies of information implies visual consumption; the page reference implies either non-sequential reading or sequential reading with a concurrent awareness of the non-textual structure of the book (specifically the page numbers). We have seen already that print allowed reading to be taught in European schools as a process of the private decoding of text. Ironically, an effect of private reading was to markedly depersonalise the literary transaction. In days when oral and manuscript literary consumption prevailed, the heart of the literary experience lay in the exchange between reciter and listeners. The reading of print by an individual was no longer a social transaction but an interior mental process. The reader's immediate relationship was now with a text. Moreover, as if to emphasise the social deprivation brought by private reading, typography sterilised even the graphic form of the text. It made the form of the text mechanical, and its manufacture an industrial process — recall here the impersonal names adopted by typographic presses. The rise of the author might be understood as a counterweight to this development, a means of retaining a personal exchange, albeit now an imagined exchange, as the vehicle for literary communication. The pains taken to establish the presence of the author of the text are symptoms of this adjustment. The demise of the reciter had parallels in the other ways in which texts might be used. So, analogously, the teacher tended to lose ground before the author of the text, or indeed the text itself.377

The prevalence of individual reading also has implications for style. When the primary act of reception was the hearing of a text, styles of expression which worked well for the ear flourished. We have noted the advantages of the syair as a genre for performance, and the consequent popularity of this genre among audiences still used to hearing rather than seeing texts. Print ushered in the syair mania of the late nineteenth century, but “while seeming initially to strengthen the old, was gradually undermining it.”378 As the text becomes more often something seen, so the forms of expression better adapted to this mode of reception gain ground.379 The very qualities which made verse an effective aural medium became weaknesses: its low density of information, its reliance on the conventional, and its syntactic amorphousness. The measured conventional prose of the classical hikayat shares these qualities to a lesser degree, for the same reason of aural effectiveness. These qualities are less marked in the unmeasured prose style pioneered by Abdullah b. Abdul Kadir, promoted through schools, and made familiar through the newspaper press. The virtues of this new style are not aural. It was at first found rather difficult to read aloud because of the lack of predictable sense divisions.380 But, once aided by new conventions of punctuation, the new style makes for more efficient visual reception.381 In the upshot, it is no surprise to find that verse is strongly represented in lithography, while prose gains ground in typography. For the period of this survey just over one-half of all the editions put out by Muslim lithographers were in verse, while for typographers the proportion of verse is just less than one-quarter.

An understanding of these developments shows how misleading the notion of ‘transitional’ Malay literature can be when it attempts to draw a single line from classical to modern prose. The idea that there is a ‘transitional’ Malay literature, in which Abdullah b. Abdul Kadir figures prominently, and which bridges the stylistic gulf between classical and modern prose can be seen to be a vast simplification of the cross-currents and turbulence surrounding the arrival of print.382 Rather it is now clear that the rise to prominence of the author, the interest in contemporary reportage, and preference for prose are all linked to a complex of changes, at the heart of which lies print, and specifically typo-
INTRODUCTION

Together they supply the preconditions for the emergence of modern 'creative' prose fiction in the 1920s. The changes during this first century of print culminated in a new class of cultural commodity, typographically-printed texts of a new kind, which could begin to be conceived of abstractly as 'literature'. This commoditisation of cultural activity has parallels in theatre and music. The same social and economic environment which favoured new print forms also gave rise to the commercial theatre and ultimately, with new technology, to the cinema. Music similarly experienced the advent of the gramophone. All these changes were under way by 1920. The technologies for producing cultural goods for a mass audience had arrived. Access to cultural artefacts was immensely increased in amount and scope — with the concomitant effect of reducing active participation in performance. The new media technologies transformed the uses of leisure and extended the information horizon. Exposure to these new media meant radical enlargements of audience solidarity, extending and redefining participation in the imagined communities of public life. The conjunction of new print media and the unfolding of new world-views is a theme of Roff's study of The Origins of Malay Nationalism.

LITERARY DUALISM

As new media technologies gave expression to new world-views, they might also be adapted to restating the old with new intensity. Such a dualism is evident in the applications of print in the Malay-reading Muslim community. Alongside the new typographic print, lithography retained its attraction. This dualism on the technological level is matched by the dissociation of the repertoire of books produced by these two methods. Despite the relatively late adoption of typography, only 11 of the 85 Singapore Muslim publications produced by typography had previously been lithographed. The dichotomy is captured in a pair of publisher’s notices. One inserted in the anonymous lithographed traditional romance Pegar Madi 1903 asked for old manuscripts which had not yet been put into print; the other inserted in the newly translated typeset Siraj al-Anam 1921 offered to buy new original manuscripts. Though their chronology should not be ignored, these notices are separated by more than just time.

The emergence of parallel print technologies with distinctive output, and very different demands for capitalisation and industrial organisation, coincided with and reinforced a divergence in the uses of literacy. Lithography was not rapidly displaced by typography and the new prose. Looking at recreational literature, Overbeck’s view in 1934 was that “Malay prose fiction has hardly entered Malay life”. Despite the collapse of the local lithographic press, lithography continued to flourish in more sophisticated forms, though its repertoire remained by and large frozen in the religious and popular literature of the nineteenth century.
print technologies can be related to a cultural dualism which emerged as a product of uneven progress from aural consumption of manuscript literature to a mature print culture. This dualism has other dimensions, like urbanisation, education, literacy rates, and reading practices.\(^{392}\) It seems to mirror differences between ‘Kaum Tua’ and ‘Kaum Muda’, conservatives and reformers.\(^{393}\) In Roff’s formulation:

the terms ‘Kaum Muda’ and ‘Kaum Tua’ came to refer to unanalysed social conflict of considerable complexity. To be ‘Kaum Muda’ was to espouse modernism ... ; to be ‘Kaum Tua’ was to be in favour of all that was familiar, unchanging, and secure.\(^{394}\)

The traditional-minded remained true to the manuscript-in-print, to the old works lithographed. The innovators, those who learned to read in government schools or madrasahs, who read newspapers, turned increasingly to the new literature in typography.\(^{395}\)

It was through the medium of the new madrasah therefore, and indirectly by their publication of newspapers and other literature used in these schools, that the Kaum Muda made most of its impact on Malay society.\(^{396}\)

INTRODUCTION

The preferences of these Malay-reading sub-communities were to change substantially only when the political and economic landscape was realigned following Malaysia's independence. 398

COLONIAL CONTEXTS

This study has focussed on Malay-language publishing in the Malaysia-Singapore region. It will be clear by now, however, that this was but a portion of all Malay language publishing in the period. In particular, developments in the Netherlands Indies cannot be ignored, for in the Dutch-administered territories there resided a substantially larger number of literate speakers of Malay than could be found in the British-administered territories of the Straits Settlements and Malay States. (In round figures, probably some 800,000 adults in Dutch territories were literate in Malay by 1920, compared with 175,000 in British territories. 399) In very broad terms the developments in the Netherlands Indies were comparable with those taking place in Malaysia-Singapore. The availability of the same printing and transport technologies, a comparable monetisation of the economy, and the stimulus of exposure to a European presence were all common factors. However we have observed in the Singapore-Malaysia case how the available technologies were applied selectively by various classes of Malay language users with differing cultural allegiances, and indeed served to some extent to delineate cultural interest-groups. The interactions between printing technology and cultural politics had rather different outcomes in the Netherlands Indies.

The outstanding feature distinguishing developments in the Netherlands Indies from those in the Straits Settlements has already been alluded to; that is, the early emergence of a printed literature in Romanised Malay. Translations of European novels appeared from 1875.400 Even more striking is the very early appearance of newspapers in Romanised Malay, the first being published in 1856.401 These first ventures were the initiative of Dutch and Eurasian authors, translators and printers. From the 1880s the Peranakan Chinese of Java also became major contributors.402 This pattern of development can be related to the social and political context in which the new printing occurred. Like the Straits Settlements, urban Java represented a plural society in which the Malay language functioned as a communicative bridge. However, there were significant differences from the Straits Settlements, which centre upon the different contributions of the comprador classes in each case. A major factor in the substantial presence of Malay-speaking Eurasians and Chinese in urban Java was the Dutch administration's long-standing practice of utilising 'low' Malay in the Roman script as a language of administration.403 In the field of publications, this emphasis is evident in the considerable number of translations of regulations, notices, government service manuals and the like into Malay, and it no doubt accounts for the early appearance of newspapers in the Roman script. The upshot was that the publishers of the first Malay-language newspaper, Soerat Kabar Bahasa Melayu, thought Roman script the appropriate medium in which to convey commercial intelligence to an audience of Chinese, Arab, Malay, and Indian traders on the north coast of east Java. We have noted that the British government in the Straits Settlements made little use of Malay in either Roman or jawi script. In short, during the nineteenth century there was a convergence of interests in the Netherlands Indies between mission, government, and Eurasian and Peranakan compradors in the development of a new literature in Romanised Malay — or as it was known, Malay in Dutch script.

The contrast between these developments in urban Java and those in the Straits Settlements are most evident when we compare Malay-language publications by the Chinese in both places. The Chinese Peranakan of Java, while a smaller proportion of the population than their counterparts in the Straits Settlements, were much more numerous in absolute terms. One straightforward consequence of these numbers is that the struggling Baba literature of Singapore is matched by a vastly greater literature in Java, so ably documented in Salmon's study of Literature in Malay by the Chinese of Indonesia. The influence of the comprador communities was not, however, simply a function of their numbers. The impact of their contributions was also conditioned by also their accessibility to the local native culture. Here two points are relevant. First, the fact that most Chinese Peranakan and Eurasians were not Muslims was less a barrier to cultural integration in Java than in more uniformly Muslim areas elsewhere in the archipelago. Second, in Java the Peranakan Malay-speakers constituted a well-to-do majority of Chinese, with an attendant self-confidence in cultural definition, while in the Straits Settlements, as in the rest of the Netherlands Indies, Malay-speaking Babas became a culturally defensive minority vis-à-vis a Chinese-speaking majority of recent arrivals (sinkeh, totok). The different situations are reflected in the far wider diversity of subjects upon which literature by Javanese Peranakan touched. Salmon has demonstrated that it comprised an eclectic melange of translations from Chinese traditional, didactic, popular and contemporary works, of syair, and by the turn of the century, a few original prose works. In the Straits Settlements, as we have seen, the limited Baba publishing effort was single-mindedly directed to resuscitating a Chinese heritage through translations of Chinese historical romances. In Java, Chinese Peranakan publications contributed to a burgeoning indigenous Roman-script literature which addressed a multi-racial audience. By contrast, in the Straits Settlements, the boundaries circumscribing Baba culture were becoming less permeable. The Baba translations of Chinese historical romances were virtually the only commercially published Roman-script books, and were closed to non-Chinese Muslim readers of Malay, still wedded to the jawi script.
INTRODUCTION

In form and content, the Roman-script literature of the Netherlands Indies represented a marked departure from manuscript literacy. A small number of older works were transliterated into Roman script, and sometimes subjected to an even more novel mode of presentation by being serialised in newspapers. But the major categories of the Romanised literature were new to Malay — translations, original contemporary compositions, and newspaper journalism. It is in this literature that recent scholarship has identified the ‘antecedents’ of modern Indonesian literature. On the other hand Baba publishing in the British-administered areas never attained much bulk or variety and exercised no lasting impact on the broader development of Malay print literacy. The Roman script, as we have seen, always played second fiddle to jawi in government vernacular schools, and did not gain much favour with Muslim readers. In a departure from current practice, the Ahmadiah Press issued several titles for Muslim readers in simultaneous jawi and rumi editions, but this experiment was short lived. So, in contrast to the Roman-script literature of the Netherlands Indies, it is the typographically printed jawi books and newspapers of Singapore and Malaya which can be considered the antecedents of modern Malaysian literature, through a more subtle modulation of forms.

The notion that something is an antecedent, however, implies that it has a latent quality not yet fully realised. To pursue too keenly the nineteenth century antecedents of late twentieth-century national literatures is to run the risk of reading back into the past categories and conditions which obscure the realities of the time. In fact this highlights an ambiguity in nineteenth century developments. How much weight should be given to the division created by separate colonial administrations? It is undeniable that on both sides of the Straits of Malacca, colonial government policy exercised leverage on the cultural development of the plural societies over which they ruled, both through the school system and through the mutual co-option of administration and comprador classes. We have already noted the coincidence in time of the Straits government’s first commitment to vernacular schooling and the British forward movement marked by the Pangkor Engagement. Similarly Dutch interest in the promotion of Malay in the Roman script bears comparison with other strategies designed to gain control of communications and transport in the archipelago, notably in the area of shipping. It was the institution of widespread vernacular schooling early in the twentieth century that gave this leverage real purchase in both British and Dutch territories. The establishment of vernacular government school systems required and invited strategic decisions on cultural policy. In the British territories, as we have seen, the government promoted reading matter which was new both in style and in content, which bolstered European prestige and the feudal order, and acted as an antidote to the Muslim commercial press. In the Netherlands Indies the alternatives were more stark. The expansion of government schooling meant that urban Java increasingly set the agenda. In the mid-nineteenth century the sparse government and mission schooling offered in the Outer Islands, conducted in Malay, used both Arabic and Roman script in Muslim areas, and Roman script in Christian areas; but already by the latter part of the century, the weight of Batavia was firmly behind the Roman script.411 By the time of the great expansion of second class vernacular schools in the early twentieth century, the presumption of the Batavia-based administration was that Malay would be written in the Roman script.412 Through the vastly expanded school system and through a vigorous program of literary publication, the government entrenched the Roman script as the vehicle for the new Malay writings of the colonial power and those who lived in its shadow. The conscious exercise of policy in the twentieth century thus put the seal on a development which stretched back to the alliance of Dutch, Eurasian and Peranakan interests forged around the middle of the nineteenth century.

Yet, as in the Straits Settlements and Malay States, so in the Netherlands Indies, the influence of the colonial administration, its cultural agents and its collaborators was not evenly felt. Least affected, or most resistant, were indigenous Muslims, assigned to the native class and thus legally denied the role of comprador, who valued the pilgrimage to Mecca above homage to Batavia.413 Some among them saw use of the Roman script by the Batavia-led media as emblematic of its subservience to the interests of the colonial authority.414 These were the heirs of the Muslim manuscript tradition, whose education was gained in the pondok-pesantren, readers of Syair Abdul Muluk, Hikayat Muhammad Hanafiah and Kitab Maulud, who, like their brethren across the Straits of Malacca, remained faithful to the lithographic extension of the old tradition. As little printing of this nature was undertaken in the Netherlands Indies during the nineteenth century, here lay a major market for the Singapore lithographers (passing in the twentieth century, into the hands of lithographers who printed in Bombay and Cairo).415 It is easy to fall in with the perspective imposed by colonial administrative boundaries, which were later to harden into national boundaries, and thus to view Singapore in the nineteenth century as as an offshore printing location supplying a specialised traditional market in Java and the Outer Islands of the Netherlands Indies. But this does scant justice to nineteenth century realities, especially when we recall that the principal lithographers in Singapore were of Javanese extraction.

For nineteenth-century publishing, then, it makes most sense to see two major concurrent streams of Malay-language publishing in Southeast Asia. One was led by the Dutch administration and its local allies, focussed on the administrative centre at Batavia. It had a pale counterpart under the British government in the Straits Settlements. The other stream involved those not so enmeshed in the colonial superstructure — for whom the Straits of Malacca were a passage to Mecca, not a political boundary — and whose presses were located at the communications node of the archipelago, Singapore.

4 So, in the British Library collection, they are bound with Malacca publications, and were put through the press by missionaries active at Malacca.

6 Malay-language books printed (and nominally published) by Kelly and Walsh in Shanghai are treated as Singapore publications, and Catholic missionary publications printed in Hongkong are treated as Penang publications — because obviously not intended for issue at the place of printing (see Benda Jiwa 1894; Catechism 1895.a, b; Jalan Salip 1888, 1894; Kebakian Sehari-harian 1905; Litania a; Nyangi-Nyangian 1898; Pengajaran atau Rosario 1891.) The same applies to Methodist Mission Press books printed at Yokohama on plates made in Singapore. (see under Fukuin Printing Co Ltd in the Index of Names).

A good example of the tenuousness of definitions of place of publication is provided by Acara Manusia 1891 which sold in Singapore, printed in Leiden by Brill, but published formally in Johor when its financier, Hermann Katz, presented a copy to the Sultan of Johor.

7 In particular this applies to a considerable stock-list of Malay kitab advertised for sale by Haji Muhammad Amin in 1894: see Terasul 1894.a

9 Dating is most often a problem with the ‘Kitab Jawi’ as the dates they give are often those of composition or translation, not of publication. See Mohd. Nor, Kitab Jawi, pp.3-4. Local reprints of Mecca or Cairo publications may pass unidentified, van Bruinessen, “Kitab Kuning”. No undated publications of Persama Press, Penang, or of Sulaiman Mari’e, Singapore, have been included.

Three books bearing dates after 1920 are included, for special reasons: Simpulan Islam 1921 because of confusion over its date; Siraj al-Alam 1921 because of its innovative presentation; and Syahinsyah 1921-22 for its information on book distribution.

Earl.y Malay Printed Books

Mainly because of lax application of the law. In a few cases there may have been political reasons for not submitting to registration: the syair Perang Aceh, although frequently published, was never registered, perhaps because of its anti-Western content.

Two major reservations must be heeded, however. First, as we have already noted with the list of books in stock in Terasul 1894.a, it is by no means certain that the books listed for sale by any publisher are all his own publications, or indeed even locally printed books. With titles advertised as forthcoming, we can perhaps be more confident that they represent the activities of the publisher responsible for the advertisement. We cannot be confident at all, however, that these titles ever appeared. Many are indeed found in library collections. Others are not: did they fail to eventuate, or is it simply that they have escaped collection and preservation? On the grounds that this doubt is always alive, that it is interesting and useful to have an idea of what publishers were planning even if their plans did not come to fruition, and that some of the proposed titles or editions might be yet be found — for these reasons, titles known only through advertisement have been included in the inventory if they have adequate support in the notices. For this purpose, a comprehensive survey of publishers' advertisements has been made, though only a very small number of the total are cited as relevant bibliographical references.

INTRODUCTION

20 Viz. Sultan Abu Bakar 1896. The others are Ibrahim dan Isaak a; Perempuan Papua a; Tong Yu Jinhua 1889; Peraturan Berumah Tangga 1896; Pansijaran 1900; Parlaajaran Sulat Bolanda 1905; Catechism 1916; Pengajaran buat Pendengar 1916; Pupujian 1916; Majusi 1918, 1919; Perang Dunia: Daniels 1919; Kalender 1920; Zaman Kita 1920.

21 Mission and Baba treatments are discussed below. Register is implicit in the title of a Malay Muslim work; thus in prose the labels kitab or hikayat and ceritera arouse expectations of style as well as content. Note also Benih Bahasa 1917, tp, referring to 'bahasa Melayu yang biasa dipakai dalam tanah Melayu'. Lautan Akal 1907 advertises its non-literary style as 'bahasa Melayu yang senang'.

26 Hurgronje, Ambtelijke Adviezen, 2:1387: “waar hadji en goeroe ... als de Engelschman”. For Arabs resident in the Netherlands Indies a bitter grievance was their legal classification as Foreign Orientals, subject to pass laws, while the Japanese were given European privileges, ibid. 2:1622 etc.

27 On the Christian presses, see Byrd, Early Printing in the Straits Settlements.

28 The chart is based on the number of editions published per year, excluding periodicals, and treating multi-volume works as multiple items. The trend is plotted on a moving five-year average.

29 This is evident in two ways: first, looking at the five years before and after registration, the increase in total known editions by Muslim publishers is 105%, while the proportion of such editions actually registered is only 20%, i.e. accounting at most for 38% of the increase; and secondly, the apparent decline in output during the twentieth century coincides with an increasing proportion of registered works, of 30-40%.

Early Malay Printed Books

31 Bloomfield, "Bone and the Beginning of Printing in Malaysia".
32 de Graaf, Indonesia; Diehl, Printers and Printing in the East Indies.
34 From the beginning all branches of the European press were closely related. Already in 1818 the Malacca Mission Press had published a constitution for Bencoolen (Undang-Undang Adat 1818). To encourage the London Missionary Society, Raffles gave the Mission Press all public documents (Haines, "Protestant Missions", p.179; Pages from Yesteryear, p.2). A short time later the Singapore Chronicle press was publishing mission tracts. Keasberry's press was sold to Fraser and Neave about 1882 (cf. Pages from Yesteryear, p.5). The New mission Press set up by the Shellabear as the American Mission Press, later known as the Methodist Publishing House became, with Kelly and Walsh, a principal publisher of government school books. It was sold in 1927 to become the Malayan Publishing House (Means, Malaysia Mosaic, pp.50-51, 135).
35 This goes beyond the sharing of works between mission stations run by the same society, as the early Bencoolen, Batavia, Malacca, Singapore, and Penang stations of the London Missionary Society. Note the RUL copy of Cermin Mata 1858-59 emanating from the Netherlandsch Bijbelgenootschap which has been marked up and cut out, apparently cannibalised for another publication, perhaps the Batavia edition of 1866. The same work was published in Javanese in 1877. Reprints of same material were mainly in jawi script in the Straits Settlements and in both jawi and rumi in Batavia: e.g. Jalan Selamat, Penang, 1838, in jawi parallels Pengadjaran akan djalan selamat, Batavia, 1837 in rumi. 42 Annual Report on Education, SS, 1886, §4. The subsidy was unintentional, and stemmed from the ineffectual method of distributing school texts. In 1894, for instance, the press cost $2,600 to run but only $1,100 was received from the sale of books. Books were sold in bulk to teachers, who had to resell the books to their pupils, and recover "the price, or as much as they can, afterwards from their pupils". INTRODUCTION

While the text-book work given to the American Mission Press was less copious (Alphabet a 1900s; b 1910s; Bustan al-Salatin 1899-1900; Exercises in Arithmetic 1901; Gemala Hikmat 1906, 1907; Hang Tuah 1909, 1914; Malay Reader: Standard IV 1897; Primer a 1900s; Sejarah Melayu 1896, 1898, 1903; Straits Vocabulary 1901) and later Methodist Publishing House (Anak Kunci Pengetahuan 1916; Bayan Budiman 1920; Empat Serangkai 1916; Exercises in Arithmetic 1907, 1910, 1916, 1917; Hints on Decimals 1916; Ilmu Alam 1918; Jalan Belajar 1911; Jaya Waras 1918; Jioigraphi dan Sejarah 1911; Johor 1911, 1914, 1916, 1920; Miskin Marakarmah 1915; Nasihat Bidan a 1910s, 1917; Penerang Hati 1911; Primer 1916; Raffles 1919; Rahasia Mengajari 1914; Victoria 1908), it was the publisher of the government's Malay Literature Series (q.v. Index of Persons and Institutions).

Very little work went to others, like the Kim Seck Hean Press of Penang (Marong Mahawangsa 1898; Cendawan Putih 1900; Indera Mengindera 1900) or Singapore Muslim printers, as Denodaya Press (Sultan Ibrahim 1908.a) and Haji Muhammad Majtahid (Alf Lailah wa Lailah 1903) or the Singapore Press under Thomas Trusty (Alf Lailah wa Lailah 1892-94).

The American Mission Press and its successor, the Methodist Publishing House printed few books for local publishers (Sultan Abu Bakar 1896; Hajj dan Umrah 1900; Manafik al-Insan 1901; Peraturan Bola Sepak 1893; Undang-Undang Cahaya 1901 and perhaps Johor 1911, c 1914, 1916, 1920 and Undang-Undang Tujuh lajahan 1902). Beyond that, their few Malay works were directed primarily to a European audience (Dictionary: Shellabear 1916; Pelanduk 1915.a; Penerang Hati 1911; Straits Dialogues 1914; Traditions 1900; Triglot Vocabulary a 1898; Triglot Vocabulary 1901; Triglot Vocabulary 1904), not forgetting the publications of the Straits Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society (q.v. Index of Persons and Institutions). Similarly, Kelly and Walsh's issues extend beyond school texts only to dictionaries and the like (Dictionary: Wilkinson 1901-03; Dictionary: Wilkinson 1919; Dictionary: Winstedt 1914-15, 1917; Dictionary: Winstedt 1920; Handbook for Miners 1916; Handbook of Malay 1900, 1913; Vocabulary: Gerrard 1905; Vocabulary: Swettenham 1905, 1908, 1909-10, 1911, 1914).

45 See notes to Pemimpin Pengetahuan 1899, 1917. Another case is Abdullah 1911-15 (volume 2).

46 E.g. Malay Colloquial 1878; Travellers' Handbook 1894; Vocabulary: Swettenham 1886-87, 1889, 1896.

47 See Proudfoot, 'Formative Period', p.110

48 An early exception being Undang-Undang Singapura 1823. The Straits Government did later have translations of important notices published in the Malay newspapers. Note also Hadiah 1894; Kanun 1861; Penyakit Ketubuhan 1838; Pesanan Tuan Hakim 1857; Police Act a 1856; Ucapan Aga Khan a 1915; Undang-Undang Cukai 1862; Undang-Undang Cukai Baru 1888; Undang-Undang Kapal 1916; Undang-Undang Polis 1848; Undang-Undang Polis 1860.

49 Kedah Enactments 1910+; Percanangan Dalam 1920+; Warta Kerajaan Perak 1897+ and particular laws: Ahkam Johor 1913; Peraturan Gambir 1894; Peraturan Hasil Tanah 1894; Peraturan Jenazah 1895; Police Catechism 1891+; Surat Abdul Samad 1876; Undang-Undang Adat 1818; Undang-Undang Candi 1917; Undang-Undang Jemaah 1914; Undang-Undang
EARLY MALAY PRINTED BOOKS

Pinal Kod 1907; Undang-Undang Sarawak a 1840s; Undang-Undang Tertib Mahkamah 1917. Also in this category are the Johor ceremonial handbooks Aturan Darjah 1897; Darjah Kerabat 1897; Mahkota Johor 1897. The Riau Government similarly printed official materials: Furuk al-Makmur 1895; Jadual Takwim 1895, 1897; Perhimpunan Plakat 1899; Rumah Ubat 1894; Saat Musyari 1856; Taman Penghiburan 1895; Undang-Undang Polisi 1893.

50 E.g. Hadiah Besar 1894 (in English, Malay, Chinese, Tamil), Undang-Undang Kapal 1916 (in English, Chinese, Malay).

51 Means, Malaysia Mosaic, p.48-50. Shellabear financed a new press by a loan of £100 to be repaid in printing.

52 See Bible: Old Testament 1912, 1916; Bible: New Testament 1911; Bible: Mark 1912.a; Bible: Luke 1912.a; Bible: Acts 1909; Bible: Romans 1912 (the first two covering production costs, but the smaller items being heavily discounted). On sales, see Canton, History of the British and Foreign Bible Society, vol.5, p.160.

54 A Brunei chief minister came to inspect the Singapore mission press under Ira Tracy, Missionary Herald, vol.31 (1835), p.240. The Singapore New Testament 1831 was a major achievement in technical terms and attracted some interest: at Malacca, Medhurst was sent for by ‘the rajah’ for a discussion in ‘his house, where a number of learned natives were assembled, with a Malay Bible open before them.’ It had been given to one of those present in Singapore. Medhurst, in Missionary Herald, vol.26 (1830), p.218 (excerpted from the Missionary Chronicle, London, April 1830)

56 “Besides all this, there is every reason to believe that many of the books circulated were far from being intelligible, and very imperfect in point of style.” Brown, Propagation of Christianity, vol.2, p.255 & n.1, quoting Malcolm’s Travels in South-Eastern Asia. Also Hunt “Translation of the Bible”, pp.38-41 on Abdullah’s untiring efforts to get the missionaries “to do justice to their own scriptures in the language of the Malays.” (p.41)

57 So, ironically, illiterates would take the scripture tracts to ulama to have them read. Cf. Abeel, Journal, p.164.

58 Milne, A Retrospect of the First Ten Years of the Protestant Mission to China, p. 167, cit. Haines, “Protestant Missions”, p.176. The opinion is well based, see Indo-Chinese Gleaner, no.17 (July 1821), pp.145-146.

59 Examples of such school books printed in Singapore are: Arithmetic 1824.a; Spelling Book 1824; Mengeja Bahasa Melayu 1827; Pelajaran 1827; Pelajaran 1828; Mengeja Bahasa Melayu 1831; Reader 1831.a; Pelajaran Bahasa Melayu (No.1) a 1838, b 1838; Reader a 1839; at Malacca: Arithmetic 1824.b; Jumlah Pesanan 1827; Mengeja Bahasa Melayu 1837; Menolong Segala Kanak 1818.a, b, c, 1819; and at Penang: Arithmetic 1825; Ilmu Hisab 1825; Mengeja Bahasa Melayu 1837; Pelajaran 1832, 1835.a, b, c, d). The catechisms are listed under that heading in the Description.

67 Harrison, Waiting for China. The Treaty of Nanking 1842 conferred special privileges upon missionaries.

68 Means, Malaysia Mosaic, p.48. The press was sold in 1927, becoming the Malayan Publishing House, later the well-known MPH.

69 Means, Malaysia Mosaic, p.47; Shellabear, “Life”, p.26: “the tract ‘A Gift, will you take it?’ led to my conversion . . . . I took it to my quarters in fort Blockhouse, and sitting alone in the diningroom of our ‘Officers’ Mess’, I immediately read through its 27 small pages. Then I at once knelt down right there at the dining room table and told God that I would receive His great gift, and be His follower.”

71 See for instance, the catalogue in Orang yang Cari Selamat 1905. This very work recalls the fine instance of multiple register in the translations of Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress which at different times appeared in several different guises. The direction of the earliest translation, by Beighton, is conveyed by the flavour of its Arabic title, Safar al-Zafid, which sets the tone for a religious work in the minds of a Muslim — and hence predominantly Malay — audience. Somewhat later another translation, possibly by Keasberry, appeared as Orang Cari Selamat. This more neutral title was published both in jawi and in rumi in magazines directed to a broad Malay-reading public, both native-born and Baba. Finally, an adaptation by Shellabear appeared in ‘low’ Malay as Orang yang Cari Selamat. The audience to which this work was directed is clear from the illustrations showing figures of Chinese appearance and dress, quite in the style of the Chinese legendary romances (reproduced in Pages from Yesteryear, p.28)

72 See Bible: Matthew 1896. See M. McMahon in the Index of People and Institutions.

73 See Keasberry and Shellabear in the Index of People and Institutions. Note that Keasberry’s older translation continued to be printed after the preparation of Shellabear’s revision. See also Brown, Propagation of Christianity, vol.3, p.537; Hunt, “Translation of the Bible”, p.36 and passim.

79 Medhurst, China, pp.572-573

80 Note Gallop, "Early Malay Printing", pp.94, 113 n.14, 116. Note further the procedure Medhurst used to print roman script and Chinese characters together (Diehl, Printers and Printing in the East Indies, vol.1, pp.289-298): first setting the roman letters in type leaving spaces for insertion of the Chinese characters, then printing with lithographic ink on transfer paper, which then had the Chinese characters filled in by a calligrapher also using lithographic ink, the whole then being transfered to the stone and struck off lithographically. The point of this cumbersome technique was to approach the qualities of typography as far as practicable in the absence of adequate Chinese types. In Missionary Herald, vol.25 (1829), pp.192-193 Medhurst does assert that lithography could print Malay "more like their own written books", and would facilitate the inclusion of points, which were so difficult to set in type. But he did not advance far down this path in practice.

81 Abdullah 1849 (441pp.); Dunia 1850 (238pp.); Perjalanan Orang Mencari Selamat 1854 (267pp.); Pengutib Segala Remah a 1850s (probably multi-volume); Benua Asia 1855 (235pp.); Ilmu Kepandaian 1855 (123pp.); Teki-Teki Terbang 1855 (58pp.); Dunia 1856.a (238pp.).

82 See Gallop, "Early Malay Printing", p.98. Elaborate use of colour is found in Cermin Mata 1858-59, Teki-Teki Terbang 1859 (on which Gallop, pp.98, 109, 120), Bible: New Testament 1856, and Gallila Damina 1858.

83 See Bustan Arifin 1820-22, vol.2 no.6, preface p.2 (quoted in Description below).

84 Pengutib Segala Remah a 1850s is an interesting compromise between the new printing technique and the manuscript tradition, for its head-words are outlined in print and filled in by hand in ink. This replicates the practice of manuscript copying in which after a page had been copied up in black ink, the rubrication would be added in blank spaces.

85 Note, though, that North's Reader a 1839 in printed jawi was reportedly also read outside the schoolroom: Singapore Institution Free School Report, 1839-40, p.11.

INTRODUCTION

93 Another classical work, Sultan Ibrahim, was used as the third-standard government Malay reader during the latter part of the nineteenth century. It seems to have been chosen for its combination of brevity, simple narrative, lack of local reference (it is set in Iran), and absence of overtly Islamic values.

94 Winstedt, “Classical Malay Literature”, p.177 calls Abdullah “master of an easy colloquial Malay style” taking as his model the conversational passages in the Sejarah Melayu, which he edited. Colloquial is, as the rest of Winstedt’s comments shows, a misnomer. The rather curt style of the Sejarah Melayu, which Abdullah and European scholars found attractive, was not typical of more widely read recreational prose texts. The term ‘unmeasured’ here differs little from Sweeney’s ‘non-stylized’: see his “Professional Malay Storytelling”.

95 Sweeney, Reputations Live On, pp.15-17, makes a further point about the jarring rhetoric of the authorial voice in Abdullah.

97 Stewart-Nagle, Educational Needs, Table XIII, etc.

101 Wilkinson, “Education of Asiatics”, p.687. Wilkinson here advances one of his personal hobby-horses, the need for school libraries supplied with good literature. His account of the Malay literary scene is somewhat jaundiced on this account. Here and elsewhere he ignores or dismisses locally-published books.

102 Zainal Abidin, “Malay Journalism in Malaya”, p.249 (on the older generation in the 1930s).

103 This was the basis of Shellabear’s arguments about spelling reform, Hunt “Translation of the Bible”, pp.43-44.

EARLY MALAY PRINTED BOOKS

108 These include the rumi Robinson Crusoe 1893, Sultan Ibrahim 1899, Duabelas Ceritera 1893, and Perumpamaan 1894, as well as the jawi Jahidin 1888.

109 The titles comprising the series are listed under the heading Malay Literature Series in the Index of Persons and Institutions.

110 Note again Dussek's report of 1912, quoted in Roff, Origins of Malay Nationalism, p.135: "there was once again a serious shortage of books in the schools, and often reading was done almost entirely from the Hikayat Abdullah, the Sejarah Melayu (the two best known Malay histories), and the newspaper Utusan Melayu."

111 Figure 3 is constructed similarly to Figure 2, but treats multi-volume editions as single items.

113 Wilkinson, "Education of Asiatics", p.686. See also Maier, In the Center of Authority, p.120.

118 The best survey of the Chinese-published Baba material is Lombard-Salmon, "Littérature en Malais romanisé", revised and translated as "Writings in Romanized Malay".

119 The Koh & Co. Press which published mainly Baba miscellanea is advertised as 'printers, stamp-makers, merchants and commission agents', Lautan Akal 1907.

120 San Pang 1904-06, vol.3, pp.i-iii.

121 San Guo 1892-96, vol. 1, p.130. Allowance must be made for some sympathy-seeking hyperbole.

122 Zheng Dong 1895, vol.2, end, vol.3 p.i, etc.

123 See note 167 below.

124 The exceptions are Rencana Piatu 1916 (Kuala Lumpur); Vocabulary: Ang 1919 (Malacca); Pantun Majlis 1908, Dictionary: Chia 1918 (Penang). During this period, all the great translations of historical romance appeared in Singapore.

125 Salmon, Literature in Malay by the Chinese of Indonesia.

INTRODUCTION

127 Salmon, Literature in Malay by the Chinese of Indonesia, pp.21-25. Teo argues for a Batavian influence on Singapore translations, Teo, “Chinese Popular Fiction”, p.36

128 Note the price given in both Straits dollars and Netherlands Indies guilders, and the advertisements included.

130 For biographical information, see Song, One Hundred Years, pp.166-167; Lombard-Salmon, “Littérature en Malais romanisé”, pp.84-86 (= “Writings in Romanized Malay”, pp.74-75).

131 E.g. at San Guo 1892-96, vol.3, finally appended 2 pages.

132 San Guo 1892-96, vol.22, in the finally appended 2 pages: “Sabab salin-an Chrita ‘Sam Kok’ ini ada banyak banting kapala punya kreja saya dengan mintak mahap mau nyata-kan yang saya suda tiadak ada itu kwasa mau turun-kan lain lain chrita China lagi”.

133 Namely, Erdu Mei 1889; Fan Tang 1889, 1891-93; Jingu Qiguan 1889; Leifeng Ta 1889, 1911; Luo Tong Sow Bei 1907; Mai Youlang 1915; Qin Xuemei 1899; San Guo 1889, 1892-96; Sanhe Baojian 1910-16; Shuo Tang a ±1896; Song Jiang 1899-1902; Sun Pang 1904-06; Wanhua Lou 1890, 1910-13; Wumei Yuan 1891-92; Xiyou Ji 1911-13; Yue Fei 1891; Zheng Dong 1895; Zheng Xi a ±1896; Zhongjiief 1889, 1915; Zhuang Ziu 1889.

134 This seems true for Singapore-Malaysia, if not quite so entirely for Java, as will be noted below.

143 E.g. Yue Fei 1891, footnotes passim; Erdu Mei 1889, appendix, tabulating equivalents in ‘chakup China’ and ‘chakup Malayew’; most elaborate is the table of equivalents at San Guo 1889, p.iv-vi which gives ‘bahasa Melayu halus batol’, ‘bahasa Melayu Jawi Pakan’ and ‘bahasa China Jawi Pakan’, the last being Baba Malay.

144 Note Chan Kim Boon’s autobiographical discussion of changes in his dialect in the introduction to San Guo 1892-96, vol.1, p.i. Also Syair dan Pantun 1890, p.87; Ilmu Nasib 1897, tp; etc. The choice of register was also a subject of correspondence in Bintang Timor, 24 Sept 1894, 29 Dec 1894, etc.

This sensitivity was partly aroused, as Kratz rightly observes (pers. comm.), by the use of Roman script, which aims to represent Malay fully phonemically, making dialectal differences problematic. By contrast, the use of Jawi script, with its non-phonemic conventions and poor representation of vowelling, not only worked against a consciousness of even marked dialectical divergences, but posits a less direct relationship between spoken and written registers.

Xiyou II 1911-13, vol.9, end.

Of Baba books, over two-thirds of volumes are illustrated, in many cases profusely. Of Muslim books only 2% of volumes have illustrations, in the main cover illustrations, or diagrams associated with the subject of the text (e.g. the surrounds of the Ka'ba in Hajj dan Umrah 1900); only four works have illustrations of characters at all comparable to the Baba books: Pelanduk 1890, 1891 which has an attached final page picturing the animal players in the tales; Indera Sebaha 1889, 1891, 1901 and Laila Majnun 1888, two works with interleaved illustrations, both of which are translations of Hindi plays which gained local popularity through theatrical performances; and Alauddin 1890.b which is a translation from a Western source of a tale popularised on the stage. Reproductions of some of these illustrations will be found in Gallop, "Early Malay Printing", pp.101, 106, and Pages from Yesteryear, plates 11, 36.

165 Proudfoot, “Formative Period”, p.112. The books were offered for sale by the ‘set’, both when printing was complete and while it was still in progress, however no discount was offered: San Guo 1892-96, vol.6, final 2 pages.

166 In July 1896, Chan Kim Boon was still offering complete sets of Fan Tang 1891-93 (completed in February 1893) and Wumei Yuan 1891-92 (completed in May 1892): San Guo 1892-96, vol.30, final p.iii. Sun Pang 1904-06 vol.3 pp.i-iii & vol.4 appended p.1-2, gives a good account of the marketing of a four-volume work printed in 200 copies, sold over a two and a half year period:

167 Cerita-Cerita Lotong as the ‘Ka-tamba-an’ in San Guo 1892-96, vols.17-., and Jingu Qiguan in vols.28-.

169 Works of over 300 pages from the Muslim presses: Amir Hamzah 1883, 1888, 1896; Anbiya 1892, 1900; Burdah 1904; Bustamam 1874, 1895, 1900, 1914; Cindur Mata 1904; Faiz al-Rahman 1894; Furuk al-Masail 1874; Futuh al-Syam 1879, 1893; Ganja Mara 1886; Ghulam a 1886, 1894; Jauhar al-Tauhid a 1880s, 1906; Majmuah al-Syariah 1892, 1894, 1906, 1890; Majmuk al-A'mal 1894; Minhaj al-Aikla 1906; Muhammad Hanafiah a … 1911 (8 editions); Munjiya 1893.a, b, 1895, 1901; Nabi Muhammad 1885; Panji Semirang 1874; Quran 1854; Sabit al-Muhadiin a, 1859, 1872; Sirat al-Mustakim 1864, a ±1878, b 1900s.

1912; Syah Kubat a ±1893, 1903; Tajwid al-Quran a 1870s; Tanbih al-Ghafalin 1888; Zubaidah 1874; Tanbih al-Ghafalin 1888; Syams al- Alam 1894 (3 vols.); Indera Jaya 1905 (2 vols.); Perang Setambull 1879, 1902 (3 vols.); Quraan: al- Kitab 1920 (4 vols.); Saif al- Yazan 1894 (2 vols.); Sultan Mansur 1903 (2 vols.); Syams al- Alam 1894 (3 vols.); Syams Bahrun 1891 (2 vols.); Taman Melayu a ±1899 (2 vols.)

In San Guo 1892-96, Chan Kim Boon gives regular reports on the progress of his translation. He had not finished drafting all 30 volumes until volume 11 was going into print. Knowledge that the whole translation was complete perhaps reduced the excitement of shared new discovery, but Chan hoped it would encourage confidence in subscribers.

For the period 1860-1920, Muslim publishers account for 60% of editions compared with government and mission at about 37%. The proportions of titles are similar.

It is impossible to know this with certainty, for print-runs are known generally only for mission publications and works registered for copyright. For the evidence as far as the registrations go, see Proudfoot, “Formative Period”. The near parity suggested there markedly understates school-book publishing, which was not liable for registration if printed at a government press.

von Dewall, “Eene Inlandsche Drukkerij”.

Ahmad dan Muhammad 1860, followed by Bidayat al-Mubtadi 1861. Of less certain status are Miskin Marakarmah 1857 probably printed at Bukit Zion (Keasberry’s press) and Sabil al-Mubtadin 1859

This judgement is based on an examination of the Catalogus der Koloniale Bibliotheek, which reveals only two works on religious subjects for the 1860s, one in jawi, Taj al-Salatin (Semarang, 1866), and one in rumi, Kitab Undang-Undang Mendirikan Imam Khatib (Batavia, 1861). Note also early publications in Javanese (Kitab Kuran [sic], in Javanese script, Batavia, 1858) and in Sundanese (Kitab Tuhpah, Batavia, 1853, 1858). All the Batavian imprints are, however, most likely government publications.

Hurgronje, Mekka, pp.286-287.

The list of kitab in Haji Muhammad Siraj b. Salih’s catalogue of 1897 gives a good impression of the range of secular reference works which were put out by Singapore Muslim publishers, all classed as kitab. These included the few school books published by the Muslim commercial press together with dictionaries, letterwriters and ready-reckoners. See Proudfoot, “Nineteenth Century Bookseller’s Catalogue”, p.6.

Brumund, Volksonderwijs, p.22. Its early Singapore editions are Sirat al-Mustakim 1864, a ±1878.

E.g. Arabic with interlinear Malay, many works including Umm al-Barahin 1883, Akidat al-Munajjin 1893; with Javanese pegon Faiz al-Rahman 1894, Mukhtasar al-Hikam 1894, Ghayat al-Takrib 1893; also with Sundanese Faslatan 1905; and with Bugis Barzanji Makna Bugis 1896. Cf. van Bruinessen, “Kitab Kuning”, p.235 on this format.

See the list of Javanese works in the Index of Languages other than Malay Sirat al-Mustakim 1864; Abu Syammah 1901. Cf. also Bidayat al-Mubtadi 1861, which however does not use the term.

In the 1890s, 31% of Muslim editions were kitab, 19% hikayat, 41% syair.

Many syair refer to those listening as well as to those reading (as e.g. Dagang 1884, Kahar Masyhur 1889; Juragan Budiman 1886, Lautan Akal 1914, etc.). A conventional opening used in syair also anticipates listeners: “Dengarkan tuan suatu madah/rencana/cerita/riwayat” etc. — though this phrase is so formulaic that not too much should be made of it. Prose, too, was for shared reading: Gul Bakawali 1905. Wilkinson, “Malay Literature”, pp.58-59. Sweeney, Reputations Live On, p.11. Cf. Maier, In the Center of Authority, p.83.

Juragan Budiman a (petua: rules of the craft).

On theatre, Skeat, Malay Magic, pp.516-521, and Abdul Kadir, Budaya Popular, ch.2. According to van Kerckhoff, “Het Malicisch Tooneel”, the syair Abdul Muluk, Bidasari, Seri Banian (Selindung Delima), Zubaidah, Ken Tabuhan, Taj al-Muluk and the hikayat Syah Mardan, Juragan Budiman (Jauhar Manikam) were popularly performed on the west coast of Sumatra in the late nineteenth century. For Abdul Muluk see also Nafron Hasjim, “Syair Abdul Muluk dalam Pementasan”, and Salmon, Literature in Malay by the Chinese of Indonesia, pp.20, 229, on its popularity among the Peranakan Chinese and performances at Chinese New Year. These syair texts should probably be distinguished from the ‘book of the film’ in hikayat form published in the wake of successful Malay and Parsee Opera performances such as Laila Majnun, Indera Bangsawan, Dewa Mandu, and Gul Bakawali. Syair Dewa Laksana may also belong to this class. Hikayat Dewa Mandu survives only in advertisements. Note that the _Muhammad Hanafiah_ 1875 etc. “Dimaklumkan kepada sekalian encik dan tuan-tuan yang membaca atau yang mendengarkan hikayat ini ...”.

Syair Abdul Muluk too often has the full title “Syair Abdul Muluk Isterinya Siti Rafiah”; Syair Haris Fadhillah is once named “Syair Siti Dhawiah”, often “Syair Haris Fadhillah dengan Siti Dhawiah”, and once more subtly “Syair Haris Fadhillah Suami Siti Dhawiah”.

Roff, _Origins of Malay Nationalism_, ch.2. Press freedoms were matched by a particular aversion by the British to involvement in religious questions. As Roff comments, this made the Straits Settlements “sniping posts” for critics and reformers. The Dutch, by contrast, endeavoured to keep a watch on religious agitation in Singapore as it frequently involved natives of the Netherlands Indies and spawned publications largely destined for the Indies: Reid, “Nineteenth Century Pan-Islam”, p.274; also Hurgronje, _Ambtelijke Adviezen 2:1652, The Achehnese_, pp.182-183. An example is the inauguration in 1906 in Singapore of the _reformist_ magazine _Al-Imam_, destined for circulation in the Netherlands Indies. Such activities were reported to Batavia.

Parts of which were also known by various other names, including Kampung Dalam because of proximity to the Sultan’s palace, Kampung Sultan, Kampung Melayu (also applied to a street running east of the Mosque), Kampung Masjid Baru (in the 1860s), Kampung Masjid Sultan or simply Kampung Masjid, Kampung Haji, and Kampung Kalang. Sultan Road is not to be confused with Jalan Sultan, several blocks to the east. Even at the end of the nineteenth century this area was on the margin of the urban settlement.

The name Bussorah Street was also current, but may have applied to the block contiguous with Beach Road, also known as Kampung Intan.

_Kisah Singapura 1876_ passim. The bustle of this neighbourhood are a concluding theme at the end of several syair.

219 In the case of separately advertised titles, like Indera Sebaha 1889, the agents may have held stocks, but generally they must have taken orders in the same way that the agents for newspapers took subscriptions. (There is not surprisingly a congruence between the agents of Siraj and those for Jawi Peranakan. — and not too much about its distribution can be inferred from the fact that the newspaper Jawi Peranakan had an agent in Paris!). However van Bruinessen, "Kitab Kuning", p.228 describes the later practice of publishers sending off almost the entire edition of a newly reprinted kitab to retailers all over the country.

221 Annual Report, Perak, 1898, p.28 (§93).

222 Proudfoot "Formative Period", p.113, referring to the Report of the Committee appointed to Enquire into the System of Education in the Colony (The Isemonger Report), reprinted in Wong & Gwee, Official Reports on Education, p.22; Chelliah, Educational Policy of the Straits Settlements, pp.63-64.

223 Apart from a couple of titles published at the Johor Government Press (Pemimpin Johor 1878, Jalan Kepandaian 1881, Permulaan JIografi 1884, Sifir Muhammad 1886), only two put out by Haji Muhammad Majjahid (Miskin Marakarmah 1903, 1915; Alfl Lailah wa Lailah 1903) and one edition by Haji Muhammad Siraj (Sultan Ibrahim 1908).

224 Of 1800 such advertisements found in the colophons of books included in the Survey, only 10% relate to scholarly religious texts. There is an understandable tendency for syair to be advertised in syair, hikayat in hikayat, and so forth. Nearly 30% of the Muslim publishers’ titles were kitab. Might the lack of advertisement for kitab might be thought therefore to stem from a reluctance to advertise in a revered work of learning? This notion is weakened by the prominent mention of publishers and others associated with the production of kitab books, and further by the attachment of stock lists to some kitab, albeit to none published in Singapore (cf. Ghayat al-Takrib, Mecca: Matbaah al-Karimiah al-Amirat al-Islamiah, 1310). In Singapore, advertisements were carried only in the popular syair of admonition (e.g. Cermin Islam 1907, Hakkat al-Islam 1903, Kawaid al-Islam 1889, Siraj al-Kalbi 1916, Tajwid 1890) and, in the same category, in the prose Mohsyar 1900, along with a single notice in Barzanji Makna Bugis 1896 and a brief list in the modern work Umm al-Madhahib 1905.

225 E.g. Jawi Peranakan no.655 (4 November 1889) advertises 5 Muslim texts in 35 titles, no.660 (16 December 1889) advertises 17 Muslim texts in 89 titles; no.709 (29 December 1890) advertises 18 Muslim texts in 96 titles. Daftar Kitab a (Proudfoot, “Nineteenth Century Bookseller’s Catalogue”) has no Muslim texts in 115 titles.

226 Tahsil al-Ujur 1887, Masalah Seribu 1888, Hajj dan Umrah 1888, Fath al-Mu’in 1889, Bidayat al-Salikin 1889, Wasiat Rasul Allah 1890, Majmuk al-Ahkam 1890, Majmua al-Syariah 1892, Munjijat 1893 a, b, 1895, Durrat al-Mudhiyat 1893, Majmuk al-A’mal 1894, Mukhtasar al-Hikam 1894, Majmua al-Syariah 1894. In any case, most of the titles he advertises are not his own publications.

247 E.g Abdul Muluk 1867, lacking title page, title at head of text, and has unnumbered pages. Similarly Sabil al-Muhadin a, 1859, 1872; etc., etc. Pagination is lacking in one-third of the books put out by Muslim printers during the first two decades, in one-tenth during the second decades, and is virtually universal in the last decades of the survey.

250 In India in the 1880s country-made paper suitable for printing was still more expensive than imported European paper (Butt, “Nineteenth Century Book Trade in Sind”, p.157; Hunter, Papermaking, p.542). Japan began producing mechanically milled wood-pulp paper after 1874 (ibid., pp.570-572), and later for export. The likelihood that Japanese paper was used by Muslim publishers in Singapore is increased by evidence that the stencilled, block-printed or screen-printed decorative coloured wrapping paper they used for book covers was imported from Japan. Gallop reports this discovery, “Early Malay Printing”, p.109 & p.115 n.43.

251 Cf. Sabil al-Muhtadin a, 1872; Abdul Muluk 1874, which have irregular pagination or blank pages owing to errors in laying out the sheets before folding and cutting. The same inexperience is evident in early typeset books: see Penggeli Hati 1878.a

252 In Sifat Duapuluh b 1882, Said gives his address in precise detail as 'Kampung Masjid Sultan Ali dari ujung sebelah kiri jikalau masuk masjid tiga pintu dari ujung, nombornyam rumah limapuluh satu 51.'

253 It is to be remembered though that the table is based upon a count of editions, not on value or bulk of publications, and thus favours the syair, which could be slim volumes printed cheaply.

286 I believe Overbeck, Malaiische Weisheit und Geschichte, p.6 reports this recollection: “Ein solcher Schreiber lebte einst in Singapore und schrieb fast alle größeren Werke für die malaiischen Verleger, aber er starb, und es fand sich niemand, der seine Stelle einnehmen konnte, wenigstens nicht für größere Arbeiten.” Although Overbeck identifies this copyist as responsible for Kuris Mengindera 1906, which the Gazette memorandum attributes to Haji Muhammad (also of Riau), the description of the copyist’s career fits only Ibrahim.

The complexities of these webs are further illustrated by some of the editions upon which Ibrahim worked with Said. First, two of the editions which Ibrahim prepared and printed at his own press were in fact titles which Ibrahim had acquired from Said. In the copyright registrations of Dagang 1887 and Air Mawar 1887, Ibrahim informed the Registrar that the publication was a copy of a book belonging to Said, the implication being that Said owned or had himself previously published the titles. The two prior editions Dagang 1883, 1884 were indeed published by Said; but the prior edition Air Mawar 1886 was also published by Ibrahim, but for sale by Said, suggesting either that Ibrahim had then been commissioned by Said or that Ibrahim was even then working with Said’s permission. (There is no evidence of an even earlier publication of Air Mawar by Said.) Second, in eleven of the editions which Ibrahim prepared for Said, the printing was undertaken by a third party, most frequently Haji Zainal, but also Taib, Tahir, and Haji Said al-Jawa. None of these printers is known to have done other work for Said, implying that the principal working relationship was between Ibrahim and the respective printers. Said’s role is clearly stated both in the texts themselves and in the memoranda of registration as being that of proprietor. In the absence of a claim to proprietary rights to the texts concerned, this must imply that Said financed printings actually undertaken by Ibrahim with Zainal, Taib, Tahir and Siraj al-Jawa.

The linkages are illuminated after 1886 not only by the information recorded by copyists and publishers on the printed books, but also in some cases by an alternative set of information in the memoranda of copyright registration. A major difficulty in using the latter source is the mismatch between the presumptions of the registration, which are predicated on typographic production in a mature print culture, and the reality of a cottage industry of lithographers. For instance, the registration wishes to distinguish author/editor and printer. Thinking of the lithographic process, how is the preparer of the lithographic transfer-paper to be categorised? In the terms of a manuscript literary culture he is in a sense the author, in that he has produced a new copy of the text. The term used (yang menyurat) is ambiguous. Or is he an editor, adapting a traditional text to this new form? — this notion makes more sense in Western categories than those of the Singapore lithographers; in their terms an editor is rather one who restores a text (benarkan, betulkan) previously erroneously copied. Or is he the printer (yang mengecapnya), for the preparation of the transfer sheets is the major task of the processes of reproduction by print? The roles of author and printer defined by the registration form could be reversed, and indeed there are instances of this. We noted above a few syair copied by Ibrahim and printed by Zainal for Said. In other cases, syair whose printed texts credit Ibrahim as author (yang menyurat) are registered with him as printer, and Zainal as author/editor.1

c Panji Semirang 1888.8

e Said had previously published only Ken Tabuhan 1873 and Nasihat Bapa 1883.

f Mayat 1890, Ulamak 1890, and Rejang 1893; cf. Panji Semirang 1888.8 (in which the text has Ibrahim as copyist and Said as publisher, while the registration has Tahir as author/editor, Ibrahim as publisher and copyright holder, and Said as printer), and Haris Fadhillah 1890, Pengantin 1904, and Nasihat Bapa 1907 (in which conversely Ibrahim is named author/editor in the memoranda of registration, while other writers' names appear in the printed texts).

293 Miskin Marakarmah 1903, colophon: ‘adapun hikayat ini pada awalnya dicap dan direjisterkan oleh Thomas Trusty maka pada 27 Nopember 1902 itu telah dijualah naskhah dan rejister hikayat ini pada Haji Muhammad Majtahid bin Haji Muhammad Said ialah yang berkuasa mengecap selama-lamanya dengan rejister’.

Another interesting case is Azhar al-Tasdik 1898. As printed it title-page assigned copyright to Haji Muhammad Amin, while its colophon and the relevant Gazette memorandum gave ownership to Haji Muhammad Apip. The trouble has been taken to paste a slip of paper over Amin’s name on the title-page replacing it with Apip. Was this done only on the copies submitted to the copyright Registrar? They are all we have now.

294 It would appear that two editions appeared within a day or so, over the names of different publishers, and in slightly different format, though both following the same pagination and number of lines per page: either because both were copied from an earlier printed edition no longer extant (the 1874 edition is different in layout), or — and this is perhaps more likely — that the nominally earlier edition of Haji Muhammad is a retouched reprint using the same sheets as the Ibrahim-Said edition.

300 Hurgronje, Ambtelijke Adviezen 3:1762-3: “moet dan niet vergeten … hier regelmatig

Keasberry’s work. It is interesting to compare Hurgronje’s observations with those of van den Berg, ‘Mohammedaansche godsdienstonderwijs’, who in 1886 noticed only Arabic-language books printed in the Middle East in the libraries of the scholars he visited in Java (see pp.521, 523, 529, 553); these books were printed in Cairo, Istanbul, or in Syria (Le Hadhramout, p.170)

301 Hurgronje, Ambtelijke Adviezen, 3:1893. However, as noted above, Malay publishing in Bombay goes back at least to 1874.

302 The diversity of outside influences is nicely conveyed by the note to Jimak 1891 which states that this Singapore edition has been produced in response to customer demand following the production of a fine edition of the same work in Mecca by “Matbaah Bril”, surely a reference to the Leiden publisher of orientalia. We find also the converse, the direct reproduction of a Singapore imprint in Istanbul: Perang Setambul 1879.

303 Note the pairs Bidayat al-Salikin 1906, 1912; Fastalan 1905, 1906; Lataif al-Taharat 1906.a, 1906.b; he had earlier commissioned the printing of Panjsurah 1903† in Bombay. For Syaikh Badal’s other Bombay printings see Matbaah al-Karimiah in the Index of Persons and Institutions. The books he printed in Bombay display on the title page the addresses of both the Bombay printery and the Singapore office. Syaikh Badal’s example was followed by Muhammad Idris, with whom he had placed some printing in Singapore. Muhammad Idris went on to put out Pribunum Sembahyang 1914 in Riau on his own behalf, advising that its places of publication were Singapore, Penang and Bombay.

305 Terasul, Singapore: Alibhai Syaraf’ali, 1921. The title page clearly identifies Alibbai Syaraf’ali’s office at 75 Arab Street as the place of publication. Page 3 however identifies the printer as the Alibhai Syaraf’ali company in Bombay: “bi ihtamam Alibhai Syaraf’ali and Company Private Limited tajir al-kutub wa malikan Matba‘ Muhammadi, Bombay”.

306 Zwemer, “Native Press of the Dutch East Indies”, p.40 and the anonymous “Arabic Literature in Java” report imports of Arabic books to the value of fl 10,000 into West Sumatra and Samarang in 1916 and note a piece in De Locomotief a year later reporting increased importation of Arabic books from into Java from Cairo, Mecca and Singapore.

307 Dasima 1912, back cover. In about 1917, Siraj issued a comprehensive catalogue of books in Arabic, Malay, and Javanese, of which over half the listed editions were printed in Cairo: see “Singapore Book Catalogue”.

308 The data for measuring output is very imperfect, relying heavily on memoranda of registration published in the respective government gazettes. Available evidence suggests that in the period 1900-1920 Bombay Malay kitab printing achieved a bulk four times that of Singapore. This undoubtedly understates the Bombay production quite substantially. ‘Bulk’ here means output measured as number of pages.

309 Meccan imprints are most often singled out for special mention by booksellers, although they will not have constituted the majority of the books in stock. See e.g. Ibarat Manikam Pari 1893, Pagar Madi 1903 vol.1, Rejang 1893, Pagar Madi 1903, Makrifat al-Salat 1903 Note the priorities in Ganja Mara 1897; “sedia bermacam2 kitab2 Arab dan kitab2 Melayu tab’ Mekah Setambul Mesir Bombay dan lain2”.

INTRODUCTION

312 As early as 1879, Haji Muhammad Said experimented with typeset printing, having the Mission Press publish Abdul Maluk 1879 on his behalf. But, for whatever reasons, no further work was placed with the Mission Press until Haji Muhammad Siraj had Peraturan Bola Sepak 1895 done there, followed by Haji Muhammad with Hajj dan Umrah 1900 and another unidentified title Traditions 190ot. Meanwhile the few commercially published Muslim works to appear typographically before 1890 were those published by the Jawi Peranakan Press (*Penggeli Hati 1878.a, .b; Kampung Boyan 1883; Dhikir Naksybandiah a 1880s; Perang Singapura-a 1885; Pangeran Kahar 1887; Alauddin 1890.b) and Hukum Muaffak 1880.

313 Cf. van Bruinessen, "Kitab Kuning", p.235. Rubrication was conveyed by the thickening of the pen stroke. See illustrations of such text in Zamakhsyari Dhofier, Tradisi Pesantren, pp.29, 32.

314 After a short initial period, Jawi Peranakan 1876+ switched from lithography to typography, though its competitors Nujum al-Fajar a 1870s, Syams al-Kamar a 1870s and Sekolah Melayu 1888 were lithographed. The editor of Jawi Peranakan's rival, Sekola Melayu, felt obliged to apologize for using lithography. (Taib, Editorials, p.50).

315 Before the arrival in Southeast Asia of typographic books in Malay from Mecca in 1887, typographic books in Arabic from the Middle East were already accepted, indeed esteemed: see van den Berg, "Mohammedaansche godsdienstonderwijs", p.529 n.1, where the text conventions described are those of a typeset book.

317 “adapun Hikayat Si Miskin ini telah biasa dicap dengan cap batu maka baharu ini dicap dengan huruf timah terlebih terang dan bersih daripada cap batu sebab pun dicap dengan huruf timah ini kerana banyak pembeli2 minta-minta cap dengan huruf timah”. Cf. the earlier Penang publication Gul Bakawali 1892 in which the translators also explain that they had abandoned lithography for the clarity of typography (“pada tahun 1880 telah khatamlah dengan cap batu tetapi tiada begitu terang maka pada tahun ini hamba capkan kembali dengan huruf timah pulak adanya”).

318 Jawi Peranakan no.867 (23 April 1894).

319 Thus the government presses of Riau-Lingga (in various guises as Matbaah al-Riauiah, Ofis Cap Gubernment Lingga, Lingga and Straits Press, Percetakan Kerajaan Lingga and its Singapore affiliates Matbaah al-Ahmadia and Matbaah al-Imam) and of Johor (Jabatan Cap Kerajaan Johor etc.) are contributors. The first typographic printing for the Riau press is Undang-Undang Polisi 1893; for the Johor Press Sifir 1886 followed by Majmuk al-Ahkam 1890.

320 The Jawi Peranakan Press had published a few books much earlier, beginning with the recreational anthology Penggeli Hati 1878.a, .b. The Denodaya Press published a Tamil weekly, Singai Nessan from 1887 to 1890. In the period under consideration, Matbaah Melayu printed Al-Imam 1906+, Matbaah al-Ikhwan put out Majallah al-Islam 1914+, and Matbaah al-Uusrah put out Suara Perniagaan 1919+.

321 In this period the only typographic publisher of Malay-language books with more than nominal vertical integration of production and retailing was the Methodist Publishing House, a gargantuan organisation measured against any of the Malay presses, which published more in English than in Malay. In fact even in this case we find instances of extreme vertical specialization as the British and Foreign Bible Society used the Methodist Publishing House to set up Malay books in type and cast plates which were then sent for printing offshore in Yokohama: see Fukuin Press in the Index of Names and Institutions.

322 E.g. Abdul Muluk 1879 and Kurrat al-Ain 1892 by Said (printing the former at the Mission Press, and claiming himself to be the printer of the latter), and Miskin Marakarmah 1915 by Majahid (at the Methodist Mission Press); Gharib 1894 by Amin; Raja Ghurif 1916, Benih Bahasa 1917 by Idris, who was not a significant lithographer.

323 Majmuk al-Ahkam 1890, Napoleon III 1889, and Gul Bakawali 1905 respectively.

324 Satasilah Melayu dan Bugis 1911.

325 Nasihat Perempuan 1903 and Cindur Mata 1904 respectively.

326 Mawahib Rabb al-Falak 1868, reprinted, apparently at the same press, in 1882.

327 Miskin Marakarmah 1915 was published for Majahid by his brother Abdullah in Singapore; but this was in all senses a Singapore reprint, destined for school use. Note also Majahid’s involvement in Kuris Mengindera 1906 with his father.

328 Daqang 1887.b; Terasul 1887, 1894.a, 1899.a. The Singapore printer Amin was involved in reprinting Indera Sebaha 1896, Terasul 1899.a, Terasul 1894.a. He was later to reprint Bustamam 1914, translated by Putih.

329 Tanjung Penagri 1984+, Pemimpin Warta 1895+ and Lengkongan Bulan 1900 were all lithographed.

330 Bintang Timor 1900, later renamed Cahaya Pulau Pinang 1900+

331 Both were operated by Ahmad b. Ibrahim, interestingly enough of Singapore extraction.

332 Marong Mahawangsa 1898, Cendawan Putih 1900, Indera Mengindera 1900

333 Ismail Hussein, “Selected Bibliography”, p.94, estimates the number of Malay literary manuscripts in European, American, Indonesian and Malaysian collections as 5,000. For other estimates, see Ding, “Access to Malay Manuscripts”, p.433.

334 Haji Muhammad Said. For the items making up this total, see the index of Persons and Institutions.

335 In order to give a better picture of reading material actually accessible to the general reader, certain classes of material have not been included in this chart. Excluded are all works in languages other than Malay, with the sole exception of Muslim kitab in Javanese (which may have been used in Malayan pondok-pesantren); publications aimed primarily at a European audience, for example the publications of the Royal Asiatic Society and the various dictionaries and vocabularies, other than those used in schools; mission publications clearly destined for the Netherlands Indies, in the Dutch Romanised spelling; and non-book materials such as calendars, tickets, charms and the like. Books and periodicals are plotted separately, the Baba serialised books being taken for this purpose as books. The hypothetical nature of the figures plotted must be appreciated. For a small number of publications there is no information on number of pages; for a substantial number of publications not registered for copyright, there is no information on size of edition. The calculation of bulk of output therefore depends to a degree on the imputation of the missing data. In the case of pagination, it is usually a simple matter to extrapolate from editions of the same work. For size of edition, the imputations are more tenuous, relying on the known practice of private and government printers. Thus while much of the plotted data is hypothesised, it has been kept as far as possible to a careful extension of known data. For this reason, and because of the likely incompleteness of our present... knowledge, the plots should be taken to express trends rather than absolute quantities. The plots are all smoothed by taking moving five-year averages.

336 The first censuses to consider literacy took place only in 1911 (Report on the Census of the Federated Malay States, 1911, The Census of British Malaya ... 1921) and 1920 (Nederlandsch-Indië. Volkstelling ... 1920). The former are very inadequately cross-tabulated.

337 Roff, Origins of Malay Nationalism, p.51

338 This is based on information noted in Proudfoot, “Pioneer Publisher”, p.14, Klinkert, (“Schrijven”), p.177, and Proudfoot, “Formative Period”, 111. In the first article, Proudfoot infers a reduction of one-third to one-fifth in cost from manuscript to typography; however lithography was about half as costly as typography. Klinkert’s information on costs in Riau in the 1860s accords surprisingly well with the information from Palembang in the 1900s. The information in Iskandar, “Jakarta Lending Libraries”, pp.148-151 suggests somewhat higher costs for manuscripts in Batavia ca. 1850-1875.

340 Even in the literary centre of Riau, Klinkert’s strategy for finding any particular title was to send messengers around the villages to make inquiries. Abdullah’s eagerness to pick up whatever was available is perhaps explained by the account he gives of his father’s mission to collect manuscripts on behalf of the Dutch government (Abdullah 1903, vol.1, pp.6-7). To collect or copy 60 to 70 books, his father had had to traverse a large territory (Riau-Lingga, Pahang, Trengganu, Kedah), and had required letters of introduction from the Dutch Governor of Malacca, a ship flying the Dutch flag, and expenditure of $500. On the other hand Abdullah says that in Malacca Raffles collected 360 Malay prose works, and that people were eager to sell manuscripts ‘when they commanded a good price’ (p.61). Ding, “Access to Malay Manuscripts”, pp.427-428, 437, sees this as evidence of commercialisation of the manuscript. However even then Raffles had to borrow other books and had them copied by four or five copyists employed on this task alone (Abdullah, ibid.). Cf. Kratz, “Hikayat Raja Pasai”, p.45, suggesting procurement from Makassar of a copy of a manuscript from Semarang, though in the absence of much explicit information about how this transpired. In 1878, Hose, in his “Inaugural Address”, p.9, suggests another development whereby in his view Malay manuscripts had become “more and more difficult to obtain”, asserting that, with the advent of printed school books and especially the newspaper press, “the manuscripts (never very numerous) are likely to be less prized, and more rarely copied ...”. Elsewhere, however, Hose shows himself not altogether well informed on Malay literary commerce. The qualification ‘never very numerous’ perhaps deserves more emphasis.

341 So a manuscript copy of Berma Syahdan dating from 1826 was sold by the Singapore printer and bookseller, Khalid b. Muhammad Said, probably after 1912.

342 Brumund, Volksonderwijs, p.9. At a higher level, copies were authorised (ditashihkan) by a guru of note. On access to religious writings, cf. Hurgonje’s amusing story in Mekka, p.166; Mohammed Makki Sibai, Mosque Libraries, p.105.

343 Hussainmiya’s observations on the Malay literature known to the Malays of Sri Lanka are pertinent: “The absence of manifestly dynastic Malay chronicles in Sri Lanka, may be understood as an indication of the community’s lack of interest in the history of distant Malay regions. ... A further question may be raised as to whether such dynastic chronicles of Malay courts were as readily available to the members of this community as other kinds of manuscripts containing popular literary and religious works. Before the advent of the printing press, manuscripts were usually in the exclusive possession of Malay aristocratic and noble families." Orang Rejimen, p.140.

345 Again the tenor of the remarks at the end of the printed texts suggests unease by manuscript owners over the damage their manuscripts are likely to incur through careless handling (e.g. *Kahar Masyhur 1889*a), and the awkwardness arising when borrowers fail to return manuscripts in good time (e.g. Sultan Mansur 1903). In a later day, note de Josselin de Jong's experiences described in "Privately Owned Manuscripts".

347 Ganja Mara 1886.

348 Iskandar, "Jakarta Lending Libraries"; pp.148-151; Kratz, "Running a Lending Library", p.3; Proudfoot, "Pioneer Publisher", p.14. The question of whether these manuscript lending libraries were a Chinese innovation is not so relevant here as their association with the cash economy and urban settings. Lending libraries continued to operate with stocks of printed books. It is possible, even likely, that late nineteenth century booksellers also loaned books on hire, but I have no contemporary evidence of this.

349 Sweeney, A Full Hearing, has discussed this process from the point of view of an expansion in the skill of literacy. Here I am suggesting that, at least to begin with, the important expansion was not so much in the skill of literacy as in the opportunities to use literary texts. In the longer term, greatly increased levels of literacy undoubtedly became the prevailing influence.

351 Dhikir Naksybandiah 1883 etc. Though perhaps these had always had a market in manuscript form as well.

353 E.g. from Hindi: Gul Bakawali 1880 etc.; Laila Majnun 1888; Indera Sebaha 1889 etc.; Bustamam 1895 etc., Ganja Mara 1897 etc.; from European languages: Alf Lailah wa Lailah 1878-79 etc.; Napoleon I 1888; Napoleon III 1889; *Alauddin 1890*b; Seribu Satu Hari 1919; from Arabic (aside from kitab): Sinar Gemala 1894; Gharib 1894; Hayat al-Hayawan 1896; Sempurna Pelajaran 1906; Maahari Memancar 1906; Mazlan 1913; Raja Ghiurif 1916; Hayy bin Yakzan 1918; Adab al-Faii 1921; Simpulan Islam 1921; Siraj al-Anam 1921.

355 Sweeney, A Full Hearing, p.72, makes this point.

356 European printers, mission or government, were not starved of capital as were their local Muslim counterparts. Consequently European publishers had access to both fine lithography and the more capital-intensive technology of typography. Their presses carried out English-language printing and printing of Malay in the Roman script, for which typography was invariably used. Since European publishers could choose either typography or lithography for printing jawi, it is instructive to note that until the 1890s lithography continued to be the medium of choice. (Note the lithographic printing of Abdullah 1880 by the Royal Asiatic Society, Straits Branch; and Wilkinson's Penang lithographs Marong Mahawangsa 1898, Cendawan Putih 1900, Indera Menginjera 1900). The exception was the higher standard school readers, which were typeset, and thus in a similar graphic style to that of the newspapers which were also used as reading material. (The second standard reader Pohon Pelajaran and all higher standard readers was typeset. The first standard reader Punca Pengetahuan was always lithographed, or produced by photo-mechanical techniques which produced a result indistinguishable from lithography. However this cannot be taken as preference for the lithographed graphic form, as jawi type large enough for elementary readers was not available.)

“Adalah pada permulaan jadinya dahulu hendak dicap dengan batu, tetapi apakala diperhatikan kepada kaum kita islam tamak jua geram dan gemar hendak mengejar kemuliaan dunia akhirat oleh sebab itu berpalinglah pikiran saya mengecapnya dengan hurup timah diatas kertas yang bagus, supaya muda2han padan dengan kehendak masa dan pikiran baharu pada masa ini, ...” Pelita Menyurat 1913, tp.

E.g. Muhammad Hanafiah 1875 etc., Amir Hamzah 1883 etc.

E.g. Abdul Muluk 1867 etc., Bidasari 1887, Kahar Masyhur 1885 etc., Zubaidah 1874 etc., Taj al-Muluk 1887 etc.

The nearest offering for contemporary history would be Aceh; the allusive histories of the Animal and Flower Syair cannot be counted here for their references and indeed the notion that they contained references had long since passed.

In a few syair: Lampung Karam, Aceh, Bah Singapura, Kampung Boyan, Perak, Dasima; and even fewer prose works: Perang Setambul and perhaps Nakhoda Muda.

Also Kampung Boyan 1883; Perang Singapura a 1885; Napoleon III 1889; Jubli Melaka 1891; Perjalanan Sultan Lingga 1894; Intan Jubli 1897.a; Salasilah Melayu dan Bugis 1911; Johor c 1914, 1916, 1920; Pelayaran Muhammad Ibrahim 1919. The exception is Mahmud 1912, a new versified translation from Arabic of the story of Sultan Mahmud b. Sultan Umar.

EARLY MALAY PRINTED BOOKS

369 This seems to be the motive for author identification in the compilations Penggeli Hati 1878, Penerang Hati 1911. A non-authorial acknowledgement underlines this point: Napoleon III 1889 establishes its novelty not by acknowledging an individual author but a substitute contemporary source, "tersalin dari Pembrita Betawi".

370 Gul Bakawali 1893, 1905, Gharib 1894, Penerang Hati 1911, Mazlan 1913, Raja Ghitri'f 1916. This was a feature shared by these typographic works with lithographed translations and adaptations cf. Bustamam 1900, Idera Sebaha 1889 etc., Ganja Mara 1897, Dasi ma 1912 and 1916, Seribu Satu Hari 1919. The point is that the number of translations was increasing as the use of typography also increased. On the other hand, anonymous works established in lithography do not gain authorial acknowledgement simply because they are reset in type: Abdul Muluk 1979, Abu Nawas 1916, 1917, Silam Bari 1887, 1890, Taj al-Muluk 1898.

371 So the name of S.P.S.K. Kader Sahib (LaUlan AkaI 1907+) would identify the work as non-traditional creation of a Jawi Peranakan Malay-speaker, if this were not already obvious from the use of Roman script. To make the point the author followed his name with the sobriquet "Peranakan Pulau Pinang". This need to identify style or register lay also behind the use of epithets like 'seorang daripada ahli Johor' (Teka-Teki 1914: here perhaps to differentiate the style to be expected from the author from that suggested by the name of the publisher Syaikh Uthman b. Muhammad Ali al-Hindi), or 'seorang pengarang Jawi Peranakan ... Singapura' (Penggeli Hati 1878 a, referring to the compiler, M[unsyi] M[uhammad] S[aid] bin Dada Muhyiddin), and perhaps 'budak jauhari' for Aceh 1884 etc. if it is to be taken as an allusion to Johor. The style in which a name was given might also be telling: active in the newspaper press were E. Abubakar (Muhammad Yusuf b. Abu Bakar), Mohd. Eunos b. Abdullah (Muhammad Yunus). Ismail b. Syaikh Badal chose to register one of books under the name E.S. Badal (Manafik al-Insan 1901).

372 The exceptions being Perak 1883, Bah Singapura 1891.

373 Taman Penghiburan 1895, Surat Abdul Samad 1876, Suluh Pegawai 1891, Undang-Undang Polisi 1893, Aturan Darjah 1897 etc., Undang-Undang Cahaya 1901. A notable exception is Majmuk al-Ahkam 1890. Some government school readers share this nominal anonymity.

374 This was a favourite of the Baba translators, it will be recalled. Beyond Baba books, the use of an author's preface is almost wholly confined to non-fiction works. It appears mainly in government-published school-books and some late kitab (Tashil al-Taflin 1914, Nukhbat al-Bahiyyah 1918, and perhaps Umm al-Madhahib 1905). So far as I am aware, no lithograph published by a local Muslim publisher has an authorial preface. Cf. Malai Zaban 1912.

375 In this case, the authorial role is that of the translator. Siraj al-Anam 1921 opens with portraits of Masjid Zahar, of the book's royal patron and of the translator in that order, thus conveying a hierarchy of authority. This book is modern in so many ways that it signals the arrival of a new era in local publishing. Its presentation has many modern features (punctuation, use of typesetting and moreover of newly imported typefaces, photogravure illustrations), and its publishers are self-consciously innovative (advertising their new equipment, appealing for new original manuscripts).
INTRODUCTION

Inclusion of portraits of the author/translator was common in Baba publications, as were autobiographical notes (Sultan Abu Bakar 1896, San Guo 1892-96 etc.), but in 1921 this is still a distinct novelty in a Muslim book.

376 This peculiarity is not mentioned by Maier, In the Center of Authority.

377 The symptoms of this change are depicted in Noer's account of modernist reforms of schooling, Modernist Muslim Movement, ch.2, as well as in studies like Abdullah Alwi, “Development of Islamic Education in Kelantan”.

379 Wilkinson, "Malay Literature", p.59: “The tale that is intended to be read is replacing the tale that was intended to be sung.”

380 Reporting on a public examination at the Singapore Free School, the missionary North noted: “Buyung Gadang received half a rupee for best minding the stopping places in reading. This requires more care than in English, because the Arabic character has no punctuation.” (Singapore Institution Free School Annual Report, 1838-39, p.14) Buyung Gadang was, of course, being asked to read aloud the new prose from a school text. Cf. also Ennis, Missionary Herald, vol.34 (1838), p.450.

381 Of course lithography is capable of graphic richness, which we noted made it especially suited to the kitab form. The point about the new method of punctuation is not that it matched lithography in marking segments of the text (which is in fact as far as the earliest punctuation went) but that as it became a more complex system of signs, it provided means for indicating syntactic hierarchies and relationships. This could better accommodate the greater syntactic variety of the new prose.

382 Skinner’s partial elaboration of the notion (“Transitional Malay Literature: Part I”) gave no role to print, nor to the interplay between prose and verse.

383 The deeper psychological implications of these changes for the literary experience cannot be discussed here. Goody, The Interface between the Written and the Oral; Ong, Orality and Literacy; and Anderson, Imagined Communities are all suggestive. Sweeney, A Full Hearing, takes up some important impacts of the interiorisation of print for literary and intellectual styles.

386 Abdul Kadir, Budaya Popular.

387 Anderson, Imagined Communities.

388 Namely Abdul Muluk 1879, Abu Nawas 1917, probably Akidat al-Munajjin 1893, Bidayat al-Mubtadi 1917, Dasima 1919, Majmuk al-Ahkam 1890, Miskin Marakarmah 1915, Sifat Duapuluh 1920, Silam Bari 1887, Silam Bari 1908, Taj al-Muluk 1898. One work, Bidayat al-Mubtadi 1861, was to be published subsequently in both lithograph and type. For this purpose, ‘Singapore publishers’ has been taken to include Riau and Johor publishers.

389 Pegar Madi 1903: ‘dan barang siapa2 ada menaruh syair hikayat yang belum pernah dicap boleh bawa kepada hamba supaya hamba beli atau hamba capkan’, the implication of ‘menaruh’ being that this is a manuscript in one's possession, not of one's composition; similarly Barzanji Makna Bugis 1896; note also the trope of seeking manuscripts high and low for reproduction, Kumbang Cumbuan 1890, Lela Kayangan 1890 etc. Cf. Siraj al-Anam 1921 "demikian juga suka membeli naskah karangan baru".

Rare exceptions are Syair Bunga Akal, Bombay: Alibhai Sharafali, 1930s and Hikayat Perempuan Asyik, Bombay: Alibhai Sharafali, 1934, both labelled 'karangan baru'.

The conventions of the two media strongly suggest differences in the manner in which they were read: the preference for prose in typography, together with its graphic poverty, increasingly discriminating and 'modern' punctuation, and its more regular spelling all point toward more private reading.

Cf. van Bruinessen, "Kitab Kuning", p.227-228 on an analogous dualism in Indonesia, though there expressed in a preference for jawi script or Roman script.

Roff, Origins of Malay Nationalism, p.87; also p.77. Note how the parties respond to threats to Islam: in lithography, popular titles are concerned with the military defense of Islamic states, as in Aceh, Perang Setambul; in typography the challenge is to learn from the successes of non-Muslims, as in Napoleon, Matahari Memancar.

Even so, few typeset books of commercial recreational reading were available even by the mid 1920s. A catalogue issued by the Singapore bookseller Abdullah bin Muhammad Said in 1925 lists some 600 locally published and imported items of literature likely to interest Malay readers. It includes works in both Arabic and Malay. Among its Malay-language works are books in both jawi and rumi. It classifies Malay-language publications under several headings, and distinguishes those which are typeset from those which are lithographed. It shows that typography is strong in the area of textbooks, both those used in the government schools, and kitab, but not significant elsewhere. The figures for the Malay-language listings are summarised under the headings which Abdullah uses:

| Kitab-Kitab Melayu       | 147 | 51 % typeset |
|                         | 56 | 94 |
| Kitab-Kitab dan Hikayat-Hikayat Melayu Pelajaran Sekolah | 45 | 100 |
| Bahasa Melayu huruf Inggeris Romanais | 19 | 5 |
| Hikayat-Hikayat Melayu | 19 | 5 |
| Syair-Syair | 29 | 0 |
| Azimat-Azimat Kitab dan lainnya sehelai kertas | 56 | 19 |

It is to be remembered that typography was by now exercising its main influence through the periodical press.

Roff, Origins of Malay Nationalism, pp.73-74

The chart depicts only jawi material, but is otherwise is constructed on the same basis as Figure 4. The qualifications outlined for Figure 4 apply here also.

Based on Netherlandsch-Indië. Volksstelling ... 1920; The Census of British Malaya ... 1921; and British Malaya. A Report on the 1931 Census. All these censuses record literacy in both rumi and jawi script without distinction.

Namely, Hikajat Robinson Crusoe, trans. A.F. von de Wall, Batavia, 1875; Tjarita ... Lawah-Lawah Merah, Batavia 1875. See Catalogus der Koloniale Bibliotheek, p.294; Salmon, Literatuur in Malay by the Chinese of Indonesia, p.31.
INTRODUCTION

402 Pramoedya, Tempo Doeloe, pp.6-7; Salmon, Literature in Malay by the Chinese of Indonesia, p.95-96.
403 Pramoedya, Tempo Doeloe, p.3; Hoffman, “Indies Malay”.
405 Malay in Dutch script (huruf Holanda, huruf Olanda) was counterposed simply to Malay script (huruf Melayu) or to Malay in Arabic script (huruf Arab). For these terms, see the stocklists in Ceritera Seorang Berpusaka, Batavia: Lange, 1857; Lawah-Lawah Merah, Batavia: Albrecht & Rusche, 1891, and in other Batavian publications. In the Straits Settlements, where use of the Roman script was less widespread and less culturally fraught, the more neutral term ‘Romanized’ (hurufrumi, also hurufromanais, huruf Romanized) was current alongside ‘English script’ (huruf Inggeris) or ‘European script’ (huruf orang putih) in contradistinction to jawi script (huruf jawi), Malay script (huruf melayu) or Arabic script (huruf Arab). See respectively Bintang Timor, passim; Salasilah Melayu dan Bugis 1911, Lautan Akal 1907 (advertisement by Siraj); Ilmu Nasib 1897, Lautan Akal 1907 (advertisement by Koh & Co); Intan Jubli 1897.a; Bintang Timor 29 November 1894 (advertisement by Siraj), etc.
406 In 1921, Chinese speakers of Malay in Java amounted to 55%, in the Outer Islands 10% (Netherlandsch-Indië Volkstelling ... 1920). In 1911 Straits-born Chinese accounted for only 13% of the Singapore population (Marriott, “The Peoples of Singapore”, in Makepeace, One Hundred Years of Singapore, vol.2, p.362).
407 Pramoedya, Tempo Doeloe, esp. p.9. Salmon, Literature in Malay by the Chinese of Indonesia, pp.16-17, 20 argues convincingly for Peranakan participation in the manuscript culture which pre-dated print.
409 Dual-edition books published by Matbaah al-Ahmadiah were Kitab Adab al-Fatiy, Kitab Panduan Kanak-Kanak, and Syair Syahinsyah, all dating from 1921. Surviving rumi editions have not been located.
410 See Dick, “Rise and Fall of Dualism”.
411 For the situation mid-century, see Kreskamp, Early Schoolmasters, pp.341, 305-307, 402; Brumund, Volksonderwijs, pp.60-63, 70, etc. Bartholo, Inlandsch Schoolwesen, [Aanhangsel:] Verzameling-staat. See also Catalogus der Koloniale Bibliotheek, §§qq (pp.331-340).
412 So the Commissie voor de Volkslectuur or Balai Pustaka, charged with providing wholesome reading material to support the schooling system, printed most of its Javanese titles and some of its Sundanese and Madurese titles in traditional scripts, while printing Malay in the Roman script. (The Malay Literature Series launched contemporaneously by the British also used Roman script only but, as we have seen, was overtaken by parallel jawi editions.) At the turn of the century, the style of Malay taught in Netherlands Indies government schools was brought closer to that taught in the Straits schools (mainly in jawi script). Klinkert and later Ophuysen, as Inspector of Native Education, had been influential in promoting a standardised Riau or Peninsular Malay as ‘high Malay’ appropriate for government school use. See Forbes, “Klinkert’s Malay Bible”; Hoffman, “Indies Malay”, p.89.
Ophuysen's policies no doubt influenced the house style of Balai Pustaka, but did not accord with newspaper practice.

413 Cf. Anderson, Imagined Communities, on secular administrative pilgrimages. Interestingly he does not consider the Muslim alternative.

414 See Hurgronje, Ambtelijke Adviezen 2:1622. A correspondent to Thamarat al-Funun (Beirut) in 1899 comments that his friends who cannot read Arabic ask about the contents of the Arabic newspapers. They propose that a Malay-language a newspaper in Arabic script would attract many subscribers and generate great interest, for the existing Malay newspapers in Roman script do not take up any issues which are unacceptable to local authorities. The date is significant, for at this time no Malay-language jawi script newspapers were available from Singapore. (See Proudfoot, “Nineteenth Century Bookseller’s Catalogue”, p.3)

415 During the nineteenth century there appears to have been little lithography produced in the Netherlands Indies. An exception is the numerous books and pamphlets published in the 1890s in Batavia by the Government mufti, Sayid Uthman b. Abdullah b. Akil and associates. Sulaiman Mari’e becomes active in Surabaya only in the early twentieth century, shortly before his move to Singapore. In the 1910s, another centre of Muslim lithography emerged in Bangil, interestingly in north central Java.

The Singapore printers who relied increasingly on typographic jawi in the twentieth century, catered more and more exclusively for a Malayan audience. Note that Syahinsyah 1921, published by the Ahmadiah Press, which had moved to Singapore from Riau a decade before, lists 12 sales agents, all located in British-administered areas, with the one exception of Patani.
DESCRIPTION

Ordering of the following listing is alphabetical by short title in common Romanised form. Baba translations of Chinese works are listed under Pinyin titles for consistency with Salmon's bibliographies. Word divisions are ignored, as is the Arabic particle al-. Thus Malayan Miscellanies appears before Malay Colloquial, and Fath Al-Mubin appears after Fath Makkah.

Under a common title are grouped variant versions (if any) ordered by known or presumed date of publication. Works of unknown date are listed first.

Titles of books are generally shorn of introductory formulae such as 'Hambalah yang bernama ...', 'Hadha ... al-musamma ...', 'Inilah ...' as well as conventional qualifying phrases such as 'yang amat indah-indah ceriteranya'.

Dates are by preference the latest date of publication or printing given in the publication; there may be discrepancies between this date and, for instance, the information supplied to the Registrar of Books. Dates in the Muslim calendar are given Western equivalents. Unless a day of the week is specified, exact conversion is problematic, as the Muslim calendar current in the Straits Settlements was based on actual moon sightings. If the day of the week is specified and the date agrees with the calculated (hisabi) calendar, the equivalent is marked with '='; otherwise with '@'.

Pagination, when known, is indicated broadly. Generally the covers of books have been ignored in paginating while title-pages and colophons have usually been noted. However a distinction between cover and title-page may not always be apt, when, for instance, the text begins inside the front cover. Subsidiary page sequences, e.g. of introductions or advertisements, are not systematically reported, though the number of pages involved may be denoted with [2] etc.

Format is described in terms of printing technique, language and script, page size, and layout. Page size is an unreliable characteristic determined by the book's binding history rather than its original printing. The text of lithographed jawi books is generally framed on the page by a ruled border. Typeset jawi books often share this feature. When present, the frame provides the dimensions of the print page, otherwise reference is made to the block of print, though this distinction is not always consistent. It is understood that syair printed in the jawi script have the conventional layout in which each pair of verses falls to the right and left of a vertical column ruled down the centre of the framed area.

Bibliographical references are given for two purposes: (1) to relate an edition to listings in other significant bibliographical sources; and (2) to indicate sources which give some account of the specific edition. Not usually included are incidental references to the item which may be found for example in the bibliographies of recent publications; nor are references given to summaries of contents which are not related specifically to any listed edition. For such general content summaries, reference may be made to Winstedt's "A History of Classical Malay Literature", Liaw Yock Fang's Sejarah Kesuastaran Melayu Klasik, Ismail Hamid's Kesusasteraan Melayu Lama dari Warisan Peradaban Islam, or other standard works.

Sherborn's "Bibliographies" have rarely been noted, as they rely on the Gazette registrations for information on Singapore Malay publications.

Gazette registrations, culled from the quarterly Memoranda of Books Published in the Straits Settlements, are reported quite fully. Recorded details of author, proprietor, publisher, printer are always recorded, as is the information on pagination, size of edition, price. Other information, such as title, or description of contents, is omitted if not useful or interesting. Such information can be retrieved from the Gazettes at the places indicated.
EARLY MALAY PRINTED BOOKS

It should be assumed that the author/editor named in the Gazette memoranda of lithographs generally refers to the copyist.

Contemporary information from other sources, particularly from booksellers' advertisements and publishers' notifications of other titles in stock or in the press, has been used cautiously to supplement the information which can be drawn from Gazette registrations and the extant books themselves.

Sellers of books are noted separately only when they are not also their publishers. Only those sales agents mentioned on the books themselves are listed, not those who advertise the books for sale.

Adat Raja-Raja Melayu
Although Hill and Byrd have this as a work printed at the Singapore Mission Press, Kohar Rony identifies it as a manuscript in the LC. The confusion arises because a photographically (?) reproduced copy is found as a book in the NLS (at NLS RBS q 398.3 ABD (Q11.4(l) @ microform NL9177). The same is true of two other works, A Collection of Malay Tales, and Hikayat Syah Mardan, which correspond to Kohar Rony's items 3 & 4 respectively
Kitab Adat Segala Raja-Raja Melayu dalam Segala Negeri :htl; The Customs of the Malay Kings, Especially Concerning Childbirth :tp; Adat Raja-Raja Melayu :col

Notes:
'Mahmod b. Abdul Kadir al-Hindi iaitu pengarang Kitab Ilmu Peladang dan Urip Waras serta Selerah Anggota Manusia': tp.
In 1893 Munsyi Syaikh Muhammad Ali al-Hindi advertised in Jawi Peranakan that he intended to publish 'Nahu dan Kamus Melayu' for which Sayid Mahmud al-Hindi of the Education Office was to be the sales agent. The price was $1.00 for pre-publication orders, $1.50 after publication. It seems likely that this project was overtaken by the present publication.

INDEXES

NAMES OF PERSONS AND INSTITUTIONS

The index includes the names of persons and organizations mentioned in the listed works. Following the name of a person or institution is a list of published works, arranged in chronological order. The role of the person or institution is indicated after each item, using the following designations:

- a: author, copyist, editor, translator, censor, illustrator etc.;
- c: proprietor, holder of copyright, sponsor;
- p: publisher, printer;
- s: agent for sales;
- n: other incidental connections.

These categories are not watertight. With lithographic printing, in particular, the roles of author, editor, copyist and printer may be indistinguishable.

Information taken from Gazette memoranda of registration is indicated with t.

To the left of each title is an indication of the script in which the book was printed. Unmarked titles are in jawi, pegon or other indigenous scripts; otherwise:

- r: Roman (rumi) script;
- m: mixed jawi and rumi scripts;
- n: not known

Names are listed alphabetically under the first distinguishing element. For the period of this survey, no bureaucratic regularity had begun to be imposed upon Malay names. An individual's name might be given in a variety of forms. This is not a question of aliases, though no doubt aliases were used. Rather, different elements could be used to make an individual's name. Sometimes only the personal name is used, at other times this is combined with the patronymic, and at other times with a term of geographical origin or occupation, or other markers of status. Even the form of the personal name may vary. Muhammad was often used as part of the name as a mark of piety, but sometimes this additional element could be omitted. To be useful, the index of names must overcome this variability. Consequently, the following principles are followed:

1. as usual, the order ignores titles and terms of respect (Tuan, Haji, Syaikh, Sayid, Raja, Munsyi, etc.);
2. when Muhammad is prefixed to a name, it too is ignored in ordering entries, though when it is a fully independent element of the name it is significant for ordering;
3. no distinction is made between patronyms, geographical and other distinguishing elements: all are significant for ordering.

Thus, in the following examples, the italicized elements of the name are significant for the ordering:

- Tuan Haji Muhammad Nuh b. Haji Uthman al-Rawi
- Sayid Muhammad Salih b. Haji Yahya
  Palembang
- Muhammad b. Haji Muhammad Said

This arrangement may appear somewhat arbitrary, but it is essential in view of the great variability of personal names characteristic of this period. Cross-references should obviate most difficulties.

Ambiguity frequently arises when a brief form of the name is given. In such cases, additional evidence, especially addresses, may resolve the confusion. This, however, is not always possible, as witness the cases of Sulaiman and Matbaah Haji Siraj. It may happen, too, that because of their variability, names have been falsely distinguished. Sometimes a possible alternative reference is suggested.

Further description may be included beneath the main name. Selected alternative forms of the name are listed, both to help in identification of the person and as a check on the assumptions made in the index. Similarly, a selection of alternative addresses may be listed. Such data are intended to be representative, not exhaustive.

Unless otherwise specified, addresses should be assumed to be in Singapore.

Subsidiary information given under the name derives from the books listed, and if the information is dated, the dates refers to the book which provided the information. Thus, in the entry for R.J. Wilkinson the description Governor of Sierra Leone (1919) indicates only that the source of the information was dated 1919. In fact Wilkinson took the appointment in 1915.

Haji Muhammad Amin

see also Haji Muhammad Amin b. Haji Abdullah and Haji Muhammad Amin b. Ali.
The publications of these two figures are not easily distinguishable. Both commonly refer to themselves simply as Haji Muhammad Amin; indeed Muhammad Amin b. Ali uses his full name only once (Hilyat al-Anam <1893>). Apparently only Muhammad Amin b. Abdullah uses the business name Matbaah Haji Muhammad Amin.

As far as possible separate lists of the publications of these two men have been made using the evidence of addresses. This may be an inconsistent indicator. Note that common titles appear in both lists. It further seems likely that Muhammad Amin b. Ali was not active after about 1900. Doubtful cases are listed immediately below.

Mission Press, Sumatra
Sumatra Mission Press
Rumah Cap di Bandar Bangkahulu (1823)
Fort Marlborough (n.d.)
Bencoolen (1822)
The first press set up on Sumatra at Fort Marlborough (Bencoolen) by the English missionaries W. Robinson and N. Ward operated from 1820 to 1826, producing only a dozen works. Ward moved the press to Padang in 1827 and issued a translation of the Psalms there. That is the only typographic work van der Chijs lists for Padang. Not until 1859 do we find another press operating there.

There is room for confusion with Haji Muhammad Siraj b. Haji Muhammad Salih. Both use the business name Matba' Haji Muhammad Siraj, although this most commonly refers to Siraj b. Salih.

In such cases only their addresses differentiate the two publishers. Adding to the confusion is the fact that the two worked together, for instance with Nakhoda Muda 1900t, the Gazette registration gives Haji Siraj b. Haji Salih as author, copyright holder and publisher, and Haji Siraj al-Jawa as printer. The book itself, Nakhoda Muda <1900>, mentions only Matbaah Haji Muhammad Siraj and Haji Muhammad Siraj b. Haji Muhammad Salih, tukang cap.

The range of Palembang Road addresses given in the Gazette must have arisen from clerical error in romanizing jawi numbers

The index attempts to give a useful listing of variant titles and subtitles, at the expense of some redundancy. The index is presented in a form which facilitates cross-referencing and provides group listings of the genres cerita, hikayat, kitab, syair etc. The forms listed are those found in the Description; thus the spelling of titles has usually been regularized, although some aberrant forms and peculiar Gazette registrations have been noted.

Direct references are given in bold type. After a title, dates separated by ... signify all relevant dates generally. The use of etc. signals variant but similar forms of the title. Parentheses enclose variant additions to the title, or mark an element not taken into account in the alphabetical order of listing.
