

MALAY MATERIALS IN THE HOUGHTON LIBRARY

by I. Proudfoot

The Houghton Library of Harvard University is the repository of the archives of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The ABCFM maintained a mission station in Singapore from 1836 to 1843. Among the mission personnel was the printer Alfred North, whose collaboration with Abdullah bin Abdulkadir would lead to some groundbreaking events in Malay intellectual history: the printing of Sejarah Melayu, the writing and printing of Abdullah's journal of his travels up the East Coast to Kelantan, Pelayaran Abdullah, and the writing of Abdullah's autobiography, which would be published later by another missionary, Benjamin Keasberry. The ABCFM archives have not yet been much exploited by historians of early nineteenth century Singapore and Malaysia.

Besides the missionary society archives, it was known that the Houghton Library had a small collection of Malay and Bugis manuscripts. In response to a request from Perpustakaan Negara Malaysia, the Malay manuscripts were microfilmed in 1989 and copies of the films were supplied to PNM.

In 1998, J.F. Coakley, a librarian at the Houghton Library, contacted Haji Ibrahim bin Ismail of the University of Malaya Library, knowing of Haji Ibrahim's specialist interest in the printing of the first edition of the Sejarah Melayu. He alerted Haji Ibrahim to the fact that, besides the Malay manuscripts, there was also a copy of the first edition of the Sejarah Melayu and some other rare Malay printed books. Some of these items were especially interesting because they included hand-written notes by Alfred North giving some information on how they came to be written. In particular these notes cast some light on the working relations between North and Abdullah.

In June 1999, I was fortunate to spend a week at the Houghton Library, during which I was able to look at some of this material in a rather cursory fashion. Feeling that it may be useful for other scholars if the Houghton Library's Malay materials were a little better known, I have prepared the following brief survey.

The Houghton Library's collection of Malay and Bugis material is closely related to another small collection in the Library of Congress.¹ Both derive mainly from the ABCFM mission station in Singapore. Their materials were in both cases assembled by the missionary Alfred North between 1836 and 1842 or 1843. They came to the United States in two stages. The first transfer took place when Singapore was visited by the United States Exploring Expedition under the command of Charles Wilkes. At the end of their extensive explorations around the Pacific and Australasia, ships of the Expedition stopped in Singapore for a month in January and February of 1842. North assisted the Expedition by assembling some samples of literature in the Malay and Bugis languages to be taken back to Washington. These subsequently came under the control of the Smithsonian Institution, and in 1865 passed to the Library of Congress. The second shipment took place when the Singapore mission was closed in 1843, with the transfer of most of its staff to China. The mission library's printed books and manuscripts in Southeast Asian languages (Malay, Bugis and Iban) were shipped back to the ABCFM's main library at its Boston headquarters, where they were received in 1844. In 1942 most of these materials were passed from the ABCFM to Harvard University, with some printed Bibles and Gospels going to the nearby Andover Newton Seminary.

The collections in the Library of Congress and the Houghton Library are thus two parts of the same original collection. They have some printed books in common, but only one manuscript title is duplicated between them. That is Hikayat Abdullah, which was specially ordered by the Wilkes Expedition during its stay in Singapore and later sent on separately to Washington later in 1843. The manuscripts in the Library of Congress cover a wider range of subjects, while the Houghton collection is more focussed on religious topics. This is quite fitting, of course, since the Houghton collection comprises the manuscripts which were retained in the mission library.

The most significant manuscript in the Houghton collection may prove to be its copy of Hikayat Abdullah. The copies in the Library of Congress and the Houghton Library are the only two known texts of the autobiography in its original form, before it was revised for printing. Abdullah's own text is lost. A copy he gave to the surveyor J.T. Thomson was taken to New Zealand and has not yet undergone scholarly investigation.² The Houghton Library's copy seems to have been the copy kept in the mission library, or more likely North's personal copy. It was not sent back to the Boston headquarters of the ABCFM with the rest of the mission library in 1843, but was apparently kept by North and sent separately. Unlike the other manuscripts and most of the books, this one is specifically noted as having been 'Presented by Mr. A. North, 1845'. While further study of the Library of Congress copy is required, it seems that the Houghton Library copy may bring us close to the original text. It has a significant number of corrections made in a second hand, supplying missing words and restoring haplographies. This is evidence that this copy has been quite carefully checked against its original, which North tells us was Abdullah's own text.³

*The following note in the handwriting of Alfred North is tipped in on two sheets of paper:*⁵

This work usually goes by the name of “The Life of Abdullah”. The name of the author is Abdullah ben Abdulkadir. His father was a respectable Malay scribe, employed by the Dutch government at Batavia to go on a tour among the Malay countries of the Archipelago and collect manuscripts, of which some account is given in this work. The son is now about fifty, a native of Malacca, his features Arab. He has a superior mind, and very minute and extensive knowledge of his mother tongue. For some thirty years he has been in the employ of Europeans, as a teacher of Malay. Sir Stamford Raffles, Crawfurd, Dr Morrison, Dr Milne, and other eminent men were his pupils. When I first suggested to him the idea of writing an auto-biography, he objected that he was an obscure person, and his life not eventful. I replied that a book made up of what he could recollect of Malay rajas, old pilgrims returned from Mecca, old Malay stories, customs, prejudices, superstitions, piracies, indeed anything about the Malay people would be interesting to Europeans. He began, soon after, to write an account of his father, the incidents of his childhood, his first introduction to Dr. Milne, and so on; and soon became deeply interested in the work. As he went on, matter accumulated, and this volume is the result. It is a new thing in the Malay language, and in many respects exceedingly interesting. It contains many notices of Raffles, Morrison, and other Europeans. For example he says, "I noticed that if anyone desired to speak with Sir Stamford, he would open the door and seem to be at leisure; and after giving a gentleman a long and polite hearing (though in a great hurry when he was admitted) he would instantly fly at his work again with all diligence, seeming to regret the loss of time", or to this effect; I can now turn to the passage. Again: "I noticed that Lady Raffles was a woman of great talents, greater than her husband's. If any difficult matter was laid before him, he would go to her for advice, and abide by her decision." Again: "Sir Stamford, I observed, was a man exceedingly diligent in this world's affairs, but seemed to care nothing for the world to come." He has introduced many severe remarks about Mr. Thomsen's Malay version of the New Testament, in which he assisted him for many years. Abdullah complains that Mr. Thomsen compelled him to violate the Malay idiom, making nonsense to the Malay reader. The charge is undoubtedly true. Abdullah gives several ridiculous instances; for example, (Thomsen's Test. page 201) Luke 2:28, "And Simeon took up the child of Jesus in his arms and blessed," &c.⁶ The account of a dissipated Malay raja and his favorite is long & interesting. There are some notices of the Dutch rule at Malacca, and of Lord Minto's throwing into the sea of their instruments of torture, in the presence of the assembled natives. Abdullah was introduced to him by Raffles; he says: "I never in my life felt anything so soft as the hand of his lordship." The account of Raffles' labors in getting possession of the island of Singapore is but a partial one; he told me he was afraid to write a full account, for fear the English would be displeased to see Sir Stamford's underhanded doings brought to light. The book contains also some account of the savages of the interior of the Peninsula, the Jakuns. His own absurd opinion is that they are the descendants of the Indo-Portuguese! because they have borrowed the name for God, Dios! I thought it best to let him introduce this nonsense, since it can do no hurt; and I wished the book to his, and not mine. He has given an account of the Malays' ideas of ghosts and witches; of the barbarities practised in their schools; of the war at Malacca, and of many other things, all in a neat and correct Malay style. Indeed, all things considered, the work is of singular interest. This copy was taken from the autograph by Husin, a Bugis scribe. Many of the Bugis write Malay correctly.

EMPB Sejarah Melayu a [1842]

The following note in the handwriting of Alfred North is tipped in:

Sajarah Malayu

Known, in English, by the name of the Malay Annals.

This book is a collection of old Malay traditions mixed with fable, and except toward the latter part, not to be depended upon, as giving much light in Malay history. I printed this copy from a collation of six manuscripts, with the help of my very accurate moonshi Abdullah ben Abdulkadir. The first seven pages in fine print are a preface of my own, setting forth the reasons of the extreme inaccuracy of the Malay manuscripts in general, the necessity of collation, and the superiority of print to manuscript. There is a translation in English by Dr. Leyden the friend of Raffles, though it does not exactly correspond with this collation of mine.

Singapore 1843.

Missionary of the ABCFM.

There is a more extensive note in the copy of this book found in the Library of Congress. It is discussed in Ibrahim bin Ismail, "The printing of Munshi Abdullah's Edition of the Sejarah Melayu in Singapore", Kekal Abadi 5.3 (September 1986): 13-17.

Two contemporaneous versions, (A) in rumi (Romanised script), and (B) in jawi (Arabic script), are bound together. The two version correspond almost exactly page by page. Note the discrepancy in the dates in the heading: the Romanised version gives the year of the fire, the jawi version gives the year of the printing.

63 pages (unnumbered), preceded by an introductory note; in typeset rumi script, in parallel columns on 22 x 17.5 cm pages in 15 x 12 cm frame, on unnumbered pages.

EMPB: Singapura Terbakar 1843.b

This may be the only surviving copy of this version of the work.

The printed introductory note reads:

A Malay Poem.

By

Abdullah

(A Malay Teacher)

Relating to the great fire which happened in this settlement in the year 1828.

This Volume is composed in an elegant Malay style, and presents, in a series of interesting and pleasing anecdotes, a very graphic picture of the scene during the conflagration. It will be found useful to those who study the Malay language, and amusing to those who know it already.

Singapore 3rd Oct. 1843

*The following note in the handwriting of Alfred North is found with the book:*⁷

Abdullah's Journal

Abdullah ben Abdulkadir, Moonshi, the author of this little work, was sent by the English Govt. at Singapore, as interpreter to a deputation to the raja of Kalantan about a vessel detained by him, belonging to some Singapore merchants. Having heard that European travelers keep "journals", it occurred to him that something of the kind would be acceptable to his Singapore friends, about his trip to the east coast. He brought me only a very dry outline, saying that he knew not what it was customary to introduce into such works. I gave him a general description of English books of travel, and a list of subjects concerning which he might recollect all that he saw on his tour. He re-wrote the whole, and produced the accompanying book, a new thing in the Malay language. It contains remarks on the people & customs of Pahang, Trangganu, and Kalantan, and a description of the dangers to which he was exposed by arriving at Kalantan during the bloody dispute about the succession. It is an interesting book, very popular among the Malays, and very useful to those who wish to obtain a knowledge of their language.
